An 'unacceptable' ranking, and a now-forbidden gravesite

At least it was ahead of Syria...

The U.S. State Department apparently finds Israel more "unacceptable" than Pakistan, Russia, Egypt, China, Afghanistan or Iraq. According to a recent article in Foreign Policy by journalist Micah Zenko that looked at how many times countries' actions were condemned as "unacceptable" in 2014, Israel ranked fourth, behind Syria, Iran and North Korea. Most of the censure related to housing built beyond pre-1967 borders, but some was for Israel's actions in the Gaza war. Vladimir Putin, eat your heart out.

Ben Ammi Ben-Israel, spiritual leader of 3,000 African Hebrew Israelites, known as Black Hebrews, a group of non-Jewish African-Americans in Israel who believe they're descendants of the biblical tribe of Judah, died Dec. 27 in Dimona at age 75. Cause of death wasn't announced. Born Ben Carter in Chicago, he believed some African-Americans descended from members of the tribe of Judah who migrated to West Africa and were sold as slaves in the United States. In 1966, he and a few hundred followers settled in Liberia before moving to Dimona, in the Negev, in 1969. He said the angel Gabriel told him to "return to the Holy Land." Prior to forming the movement, which practises veganism and polygamy, he'd dropped out of high school and joined the U.S. Army.

Pilgrimage cancelled

A court in Alexandria, Egypt, cancelled the annual Jewish pilgrimage to the grave of 19th-century Moroccan Rabbi Yaakov Abu Hasira, in Damanhour in the Nile Delta. The ruling on Dec. 29, the anniversary of his death, was part of a lawsuit alleging the festival violates local traditions. Hundreds of Israelis annually visit the grave of the rabbi, who was on his way to the Holy Land when his ship sank. He survived and made his way to Egypt, where he died in 1880. The court also revoked a 2001 decision by Egypt's Ministry of Culture that listed the tomb as a heritage site and ruled the rabbi's remains shouldn't be transferred to Israel, which made a request two years ago. Visits to the site had been suspended since president Hosni Mubarak's ouster in 2011. ■

Tribute to Béliveau

I wanted to say how much I enjoyed Paul Lungen's tribute to Jean Béliveau ("Hockey legend Jean Béliveau was my idol growing up," Dec. 25).

Although I've been a lifelong Leafs supporter, I've always been a great admirer of Béliveau. He was the only player who had the potential to sway my loyalty. I watched the entire funeral service and tried to think of any player, past or present, who would garner the type of attention and accolades that were so much a part of Béliveau.

Béliveau made hockey the game that it was meant to be, played for love of the sport, not for the dollar.

Carlebach and Cosby

It is hard to find a more perfect example of character assassination and lashon hara than Asher Lovy's comparison of Bill Cosby and Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach ("Carlebach and Cosby: can we separate art and artist?" Dec. 18.)

The actor and comedian Bill Cosby is accused by numerous women of drugging and raping them while they were unconscious – a truly criminal act.

Rabbi Carlebach was part of the 1960s free love movement and did break the Orthodox taboo of negiah (forbidden touching) by hugging his holy brothers and holy sisters, and many women sought him out precisely to feel the warm embrace of this charismatic and gifted rabbi.

There have been innuendoes over the years that his loving hugs of some women may have crossed the line into impropriety, but that is hardly in the same category as Cosby, and sadly, Rabbi Carlebach is not alive to defend himself.

In fact, the only thing Cosby and Rabbi Carlebach have in common is that their last names start with a C.

Premier doesn't merit award

I am profoundly troubled that the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) would honour Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne with the Words and Deeds Leadership Award, given the position previously and aggressively adopted by her when she opposed the public funding of our Jewish day schools.

Wynne was utterly disrespectful of our views and opinions when she attacked those who would argue in favour of equity in the public funding of our children's schools. We were treated like second-class citizens then, and she continues to treat us as such.

Honouring Wynne demonstrates a serious lack of judgment on CIJA's part. CIJA is clearly out of touch with the thousands of parents who continue to suffer the debilitating financial burden of sending their children to Jewish schools.

Perhaps Wynne will respond to CIJA's efforts to aggrandize her by contributing more funds to build large and expensive edifices, which our community leaders believe we so desperately need. Buildings alone, however, will not generate a new generation of Jewish children who are supportive of Jewish and Zionist values.

Rescue versus collaboration

I have been following the argument of whether Reszo Kastner was a collaborator or a rescuer ("When rescue is not collaboration," Dec. 4).

One very important comment is missing. Those people he was able to save paid a ransom (Swiss bank accounts, gold, silver, diamonds, etc.). It is well known that only rich families were able to do that.

I survived the Holocaust in Budapest. I was a forced labourer, digging trenches beside the Danube River, and then liberated from the ghetto.

The impossibility of peace

Yossi Klein Halevi says, "The [Israeli] right was correct about the impossibility of reaching an agreement with the Palestinian national movement that denies our legitimacy in any borders," (Dec. 11). He ignores the 2002 Arab Peace Initiative endorsed by every Arab state at the Arab League summit in Beirut, and re-endorsed at their 2007 meeting. It is a significant denial of that "impossibility."

RABBI·2·RABBI

The power of the pulpit

Talmudic and halachic brilliance has its place, but the pace and intensity of the synagogue rabbinate, as well as tending to congregational needs, present challenges and opportunities

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Scheier: There's a great saying attributed to Rebbe Uri of Strelisk (also known as HaSaraf, 1757-1826): "None of us serves our generation alone. For example, David continues to inspire the downcast with his fiery passion, generation after generation. And Sampson's heroics continue to give courage to the meek until this day."

In my journey of learning, I've been blessed to encounter many "greats" whose teachings and attributes I attempt to share with my community. In addition to the great attributes of out ancestors, there are contemporary Jewish heroes who inspire and influence. If only I could convey Rabbi Avi Weiss' love of Jews, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks' brilliant articulation of Jewish values and ideas, and the late Rabbi David Hartman's passionate struggle with, and love for, our tradition.

Who are the greats you invite to accompany you as you serve our generation?

Rabbi Cutler: In my rabbinic life, the creative tensions between the teachings of rabbis and professors Joel Roth, Neil Gillman and Gordon Tucker at the Jewish Theological Seminary continue to influence the way I think and teach about Judaism.

In my personal life, I have been drawn to the character of Elisha ben Avuya, as he is portrayed in rabbinic literature and Rabbi Milton Steinberg's classic book As A Driven Leaf. The pull he felt between tradition and modernity, between the Jewish world and the secular world, is a theme that inspires the way I choose to live my life.

Certainly, when I think of rabbis whose best characteristics I try to emulate, I think of my childhood rabbi, the late Joseph Kelman of Toronto's Beth Emeth Synagogue, and his foundational role in establishing programs for Jewish adults with developmental challenges. I am also fortunate to serve alongside a wonderful senior rabbi, Baruch Frydman-Kohl, whose tirelessness and remarkable devotion has taught me much.

It's interesting to me that two of the three rabbis you list spent much of their career outside of the pulpit rabbinate. It was after they left the pulpit that rabbis Hartman and Sacks gained their international reputations and exerted their strongest influences. Is there something about the pulpit rabbinate that makes certain types of Jewish expressions or scholarship challenging? Does moving beyond our synagogues open up space for greater influence or the expression of values that are otherwise hidden?

Rabbi Scheier: When I was deciding which rabbinical school to attend, it was important to me to be exposed not only to great talmudic and halachic brilliance, but also to role models in the practical rabbinic pulpit.

My rabbinical school, Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, did just that, beginning with the founder, Rabbi Avi Weiss. Further, of the many rabbis and scholars I learned from, the one who had the greatest impact on my life (in terms of ethics and weltanschauung) was a pulpit rabbi: it was the concern for humanity and genuine interest in his parishioners' lives that I observed in Rabbi Aryeh Sokoloff (formerly of my hometown, Rochester, N.Y.) that made me believe in the potential power of the pulpit rabbinate.

Everything about the pace and intensity of the pulpit, along with the responsibility of tending to institutional and pastoral needs, challenges the primacy of Torah study in a rabbi's life. The great paradox is that a rabbi's hectic schedule often makes finding personal time for Torah study one of the rabbi's greatest challenges.

Rabbi Cutler: What I continue to love about the pulpit rabbinate is that every day presents new challenges and opportunities. Many often think of pulpit rabbis as specialists, but we know that we're general practitioners. We get to preach, foster institutional change, teach, counsel, manage budgets, lead communal prayer and much, much more. Five-and-a-half years out of seminary, I continue to get excited when my phone rings, never knowing what the next question or task will bring. The sheer diversity of what I do keeps me excited to come to shul every day.

More than any other Jewish institution, synagogues are the key to fostering a vibrant, meaningful Jewish life. We connect to more people at more key points in life and offer a larger variety of services than any other single institution. Synagogues are playing a central role in the creation of a positive future. ■

Taking sides on the USY decision

On Dec. 22, United Synagogue Youth (USY) announced a change to its policy on interdating for young leaders. In this week's CJN, we explore the controversial decision by the youth wing of Conservative Judaism and what it means for the greater Conservative movement.

As Rabbi Adam Cutler explains in an engaging dialogue with Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, the previous wording directed USY leaders to "refrain from relationships which can be construed as interdating." The new language, by contrast, encourages young Conservative authorities to "strive to model healthy Jewish dating choices" – which includes "recognizing the importance of dating within the Jewish community."

The difference between the old and new text is small, and interdating remains taboo, albeit perhaps less so than before. Moreover, the decision affects a tiny number of young Jewish leaders. As United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism CEO Rabbi Steven Wernick tells CJN reporter Sheri Shefa, the interdating rule – both the old one and the new one – is enforceable only for "kids who wish to become regional officers or international officers or board members." That's less than 100 people in total.

Even so, some Conservative leaders are welcoming the amendment as a sign of greater progress. "The previous language was negative, and they replaced it with positive language," Rabbi Stephen Schwarzman of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Toronto tells Shefa. "I think it's an effort to be in step with the times, and when I say that, I don't mean it negatively, I mean it positively."

Meanwhile, in an article in this week's CJN, Emma Pascoe, a recent USY leader, argues, "USYers aren't denying that dating within the faith is an important principle. However, they note that some USYers come from families where only one parent may have grown up in a Jewish home, or who may have at one point had a relationship with a non-Jew." For Pascoe, the change in language is proof that "values of respect and inclusivity are alive and well in today's Conservative Jewish youth."

But for other Conservative leaders, the USY amendment sets a dangerous precedent. Rabbi Jarrod Grover, the spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto, pulled no punches when he spoke to Shefa. "I think this shows a weakening of the movement's principles," he said, "and I am appalled about what happened."

"I think it is important that the movement knows what it believes in, as it should know what it does not believe in," he continued, "and that's the problem. That we are afraid to say what we do not believe in."

Rabbi Cutler maintains that "a generous reading of the amendment would result in no practical change." And yet, he admits "a subtle practical shift has, in fact, taken place."

The USY decision is only a few weeks old, and it remains to be seen to what extent the actions of young leaders will affect the greater Conservative movement. Conservative decision-makers are already taking sides on the matter, and time will tell whether the two opposing viewpoints can find some middle ground. As Rabbi Frydman-Kohl tells Rabbi Cutler, "bridges are important, but there also have to be borders."

The question is: when do you build bridges, and when do you secure your borders? ■ — YONI

The Wajcblum sisters: Auschwitz saboteurs

Sharon Abron Drache

From her liberation in 1945 until her death in 2011, Anna Wajcblum Heilman faithfully marked the anniversaries of two uniquely related Auschwitz events. The first was the Oct. 7, 1944 Sonderkommando uprising, during which Crematorium IV was blown up. The second was the Jan. 5, 1945, hanging of four young women – Ala Gertner, Roza Rabota, Regina Safirsztajn and Anna's sister, Estusia – held accountable for smuggling gunpowder to the Sonderkommandos.

At Auschwitz, the Wajcblum sisters were passed from one kommando (slave labour unit) to another until they volunteered for a kommando at the Weichsell Metal Union Werke (the Auschwitz Munitions Factory). They were assigned to separate work detail – Estusia to the Pulverraum, where the gunpowder was manufactured, and Anna to a work table of 11 girls outside the Pulverraum. Each girl was handed a measuring instrument called a lehre (gauge) to check the accuracy of indentations created by a giant machine called the Presse.

To save herself from the tedium of the robotic assignment, Anna dared to sneak over to the Presse to see how it worked. She discovered that the distance between her table and the machines was incredibly short, and she stored this information at the back of her mind.

As work at the factory continued, the girls learned that the Polish Home Army (PHA) was in contact with the Polish Underground in Auschwitz (PUA). There was a plan in place for the PHA to attack the camp from the outside while the PUA and other prisoners would do what they could to help from the inside. Reminded of their Hashomer Hatzair (Zionist youth group) resistance in the Warsaw Ghetto, Anna and Estusia joined the insiders to collect and hide whatever implements they could find for the future revolt, including hammers, ropes, axes, knives, insulated wire-cutting shears and even guns.

Anna Wajcblum Heilman

To keep up their spirits, the girls talked long into the night. One evening, Ala Gertner revealed that the Sonderkommandos, male slaves responsible for leading prisoners to the gas chambers and removing the corpses after they were showered with poisonous gas, were also planning a revolt in conjunction with the PHA. (Every few months, the Sonderkommandos were liquidated, shoved into the ovens by their replacements.)

In her diary, Anna wrote: "We didn't have weapons. What we were collecting was better than nothing, but not much… I talked to Estusia about trying to steal gunpowder from the factory and passing it to Roza. Estusia was aghast. She wouldn't hear of it. It was impossible, ridiculous, forget it. I wouldn't let her be. Finally, with trepidation, she gave in."

The gunpowder was slate grey with the consistency of coarse salt. Estusia's seat was the first leading to the inside door of the factory. Anna writes: "Once a day I used to walk in with an empty box, give it to Estusia, and get a box full of debris to be emptied into the garbage bin. Estusia would put small quantities of gunpowder wrapped in pieces of knotted cloth, hidden among the garbage."

Back at the work table, Anna stuffed the gunpowder into small pouches sewn inside her dress. The smugglers returned to the camp in groups of three, always trying to be in the middle of a column, never at the end, never at the beginning, so that when they heard the dreaded word "inspection," they had time to spill the hidden gunpowder and grind it into the ground. They succeeded in bringing back substantial quantities of gunpowder to the camp, passing it from one insider to another until it reached Roza Rabota, who deposited it at the wires near the crematorium for her lover to pick up.

As they waited for their password, the Sonderkommandos made crude grenades from metal shoe polish tins, packing them with the stolen gunpowder to be ignited by small wicks of braided cotton. But when an informer told the SS of the impending plot, they decided to act on their own, blowing up Crematorium IV on Oct. 7, 1944. Analysis of the gunpowder traced it to the union factory.

Interrogations began. Rozyczka (Rose Meth), who worked in the Pulverraum with Estusia, was terribly beaten. She revealed nothing. During an inspection of the union factory's night shift, Klara, a Russian (whom Anna and Estusia had never trusted) was questioned when she was found with a parcel of bread that her boyfriend had given her. Instead of betraying him, she told the SS guards that if they let her go she would name one of the girls involved in smuggling the gunpowder. Klara betrayed Ala Gertner. After a terrible beating, she broke down and denounced Roza Rabota and Estusia, who were taken to the bunker, a prison in the men's camp under the control of the Jewish kapo, Jacob. A few days later, they were released, more dead than alive. In December, Estusia, Ala and Roza were taken back to the bunker with Regina Safirztajn, the supervisor of the Pulverraum.

Marta, who worked in the packerai (post office) in the men's camp, became the messenger for the two sisters during Estusia's final torture sessions. With Jacob's orders from Berlin to hang the girls, one last note came from Estusia: "I know what is in store for me, but I readily go to the gallows. I only ask that you take care of my sister Hanka, so that I may die easier." Marta responded, "Estusia, I promise that I will never abandon Hanka."

On June 19, 1991, in the memorial garden of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum in Jerusalem, a monument was dedicated to Ala Gertner, Roza Rabota, Regina Safirztajn and Estusia Wajcblum. Anna and her oldest sister, Sabina, were given the honour of lighting the eternal flame.

Anna Wajcblum Heilman died on May 1, 2011. She was buried on May 2, exactly 66 years after she was officially liberated. Whenever she spoke about the gunpowder plot, she bore witness reluctantly, with the ghost of her beloved sister hovering close by. ■

Eddie Greenspan: dedicated to justice and defending the defenceless

BRIAN GREENSPAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

(Editor's note: Eddie Greenspan passed away Dec. 24 at the age of 70. Below is an excerpt from his brother Brian's eulogy.)

My brother Eddie ascended, and eventually transcended, the very peak of the legal profession. From a fiercely talented, young advocate, he rose to become the model for all of us who wanted to be lawyers in the first place. The tributes to Eddie's remarkable life have eloquently and publicly resonated throughout our country these past few days – it is clear from the countless messages of admiration and affection that so many of you share our profound sadness and that our heartbreak is your heartbreak – our entire family is deeply grateful for the tremendous outpouring of love and respect.

Eddie's devotion to our justice system is legendary. His enormous contribution to the administration of criminal justice has been and will continue to be a source of inspiration to current and future generations of those who view the role of the defence as Eddie did: as the defenders of democracy. As the safeguard against tyranny.

But his passion for justice – and his passionate fight against injustice – represented only one aspect of his remarkable life. He was intolerant of intolerance, he couldn't fathom disloyalty, and despite his apparent comfort and ease with the smell of the greasepaint and the roar of the crowd, he was intensely private, in some ways almost shy. He was passionate about his family, he was passionate about his friendships, he was passionate about literature and film, he was passionate about food and travel, and he was passionate about his continuing search for knowledge. Eddie's library was the temple in which he thoughtfully and meticulously housed his life of learning and ideas, ideas he shared so generously with law students, colleagues, friends and family.

Eddie was not only our lifelong friend and confidante, he was the barometer by which we judged our successes and our failures. Despite his toughness at times, Eddie embodied our mother's values – he was unfailingly and genuinely courteous and respectful to everyone he met. His celebrated sense of humour, his impeccable timing, his deadpan delivery, were foreshadowed by his contagious sense of mischief – the twinkle in his eye. He was addicted to the comedians of the '60s – while our friends listened to Motown, he recited verbatim Shelley Berman, Lenny Bruce, Jackie Mason, Bob Newhart and the Smothers Brothers. Eddie would take a simple line – a simple theme – and make it a comedic symphony. It always began with that twinkle in his eye, that sense of mischief – always self-effacing, relentlessly on target, but never mean.

I fondly recall perhaps the one occasion when neither his sense of mischief nor his sense of humour put a smile on our mother's face. While home for the weekend in Niagara Falls during his first year in university, he asked our mother if he could borrow the car to go out on a date. Mom, always a soft touch, gave him the car. Only he hadn't told her that the date was almost two hours away in Toronto.

He phoned me, his 16-year-old brother, at midnight. "Cover for me," he said. He had been at Fran's Restaurant with his date, only to discover that mom's car had been stolen while he was eating a hamburger.

"What should I say?" I asked. "Be creative," he replied.

But no amount of creativity could have saved the day. By the time he called again, a few hours later, the car had been found downtown, crashed into a wall. Still, Eddie's creativity, his early advocacy, did save the day – he convinced mom that she had, in fact, known he was going to Toronto and that he was the victim of this horrible and traumatic crime.

Niagara Falls was not only our birthplace, it was a town in which the values of loyalty, friendship and generosity – values in which Eddie so deeply believed – were fostered and embraced. When our father passed away, Niagara's small, but tightly knit Jewish community provided both emotional and financial support, and arranged subsidies for us to attend Young Judaea camps. Our family had been firmly rooted in Yiddish tradition and culture, and through our involvement in Young Judaea – which Eddie brought to Niagara Falls – we developed a strong and indelible connection with Israel. It was a connection to which Eddie was devoted throughout his life: Israel as a beacon of democracy and hope.

Canada's pursuit of social justice was both enhanced and advanced on almost a daily basis over the course of the past 45 years by my brother, just as on a daily basis he enriched the lives of family and friends. The courts, his colleagues and his clients will long remember his forceful advocacy, and his dedication to justice and the defence of the defenceless.

Those of us who knew him and loved him will cherish the memory of his warmth, his intellect, his humour, his perceptiveness, and his sage advice. Eddie's life was not only well lived, it was lived courageously, with an unerring sense of purpose and compassion. ■

Time to expose hypocrisy of campus anti-Zionists

Gil Troy

Part of the reason why most of my pro-Israel advocacy, on campus and off, focuses on building a positive, proactive Zionist vision is because much pro-Israel advocacy is depressing. The arguments go round and round. The hatred against Israel is irrational, disproportionate and often vicious.

The now-infamous video of an ISIS flag welcomed when waved at UC Berkeley – and an Israeli flag repeatedly denounced – reflects a broader epidemic of idiocy – and unfairness – on campuses. ISIS activists are sadists. Anybody who pays attention to the Middle East would find videos of these Islamosadists gleefully beheading opponents and randomly shooting at civilians, all in the name of their Islamist state. Yet despite this despicable behaviour, I am unaware of a single demonstration against ISIS on campus. Meanwhile, the demonization of Israel continues.

Israel isn't perfect, but the pile-on against the Jewish state is disproportionate, irrational and not only about Israeli actions or Palestinian rights. Further proof of the bias has come from two exposes by honest college students who refuse to be manipulated any more by the haters.

Holly Bicerano, a Boston University student, was an Open Hillel activist. Believing in free speech and open debate, she naively joined the movement to push the Jewish umbrella organization on campus to host anti-Israel speakers. Why Jews must host anti-Israel speakers when feminist organizations never host misogynists, gay organizations never host homophobes, and anti-Israel organizations never host Zionists is beyond me. How this becomes a free speech issue when there are so many other venues on campus for anti-Israel programs, including anti-Israel "apartheid" weeks, is also beyond me. I guess I'm not a good enough academic to ignore facts and logic and simply embrace ideology.

Bicerano, however, noticed two disturbing trends at (allegedly) Open Hillel, the more she became involved. First, Open Hillel wanted to host pro-boycott speakers – that an organization devoted to openness would welcome crusaders for shutting down contacts and debate made no sense. She also discovered the intolerance of the supposedly tolerant, that "many Open Hillel leaders are intolerant of pro-Israel voices that they dislike." In other words, much of Open Hillel was more about creating a one-sided anti-Israel Hillel, using often the only Jewish space on campus to trash the only Jewish state. She resigned, and outed Open Hillel in a Times of Israel column.

Similarly, over the summer, Anthony Berteaux, a non-Jewish, pro-Palestinian columnist at San Diego State University, noticed that Students for Justice in Palestine (SJP) "demonized Israel and Jewish students" in trying to get "the public to see Israel as a terrorist state." The rhetoric, falsely comparing Israel to annihilationist Nazi Germany and to racist South Africa, disturbed him. He watched the news and saw Israel trying to limit damage in Gaza. He read Israel's declaration of independence and saw the commitment to "equality." Feeling duped, realizing that "Hate… is not a pathway toward peace," he denounced SJP and was then targeted along with other pro-Israel activists on campus as an Islamophobe, ethnic cleanser, etc.

These two undergraduates should be commended for having the intellectual integrity to go public, correct their mistakes and out their dishonest colleagues. But we should be careful. Just because there is some dishonesty on the anti-Israel side does not make Israel perfect or every Israel critic an anti-Semite. Yet there are disturbing patterns: mass blind spots demonizing Israel while excusing Palestinian and Islamist behaviour. Academics and activists with integrity should ask why while pro-Israel activists need to make sure that in our justifiable anger, we don't go overboard and mirror our enemies by shutting down debate or demonizing enemies. Berteaux noticed that the campus pro-Israel club did not mimic its enemy. The Zionist activists had "integrity." That's more precious than winning the occasional debating point. ■

Information technologies, community and thinking

Sara Horowitz

Whether you embrace or reject new information technologies, it's clear that new ways of communicating, generating and absorbing knowledge have an impact on how we learn and think. Much of our world now happens online.

With the accessibility of the web, print publishers increasingly struggle to maintain a reader base and financial solvency. The end of 2014 saw the effective demise of the New Republic, a century-old magazine defined by its in-depth analyses of politics and culture, progressive orientation and support for Israel. Its owner, Facebook billionaire Chris Hughes, forced out senior editors Franklin Foer and Leon Wieseltier and began morphing TNR into a trendier and more profitable digital media company that promises a "more diverse" outlook (something many interpret as signalling a different stance on Israel).

It's hard to not read into the New Republic saga a cautionary tale about new technology and what drives readership and profits on the web. Many periodicals that began as print publications make their digitized content available online – including daily and weekly newspapers, magazines and scholarly journals. The Jewish world has been enriched by this access, as well as by e-zines born as online venues, such as Tablet and Jewcy.

Sometimes this makes print publications superfluous. For example, with our 2014 issue, my co-editor, Gilah Langer, and I decided to wind down Kerem, a journal of creative explorations in Judaism. We founded Kerem in 1992 to publish articles with a modern take on Jewish thought, texts and rituals. Today, the online archive of our magazine (www.kerem.org) joins many other virtual homes for such material, which appears with an immediacy that print cannot match. Want a baby-naming ritual for girls? I can get you 40. Want an egalitarian wedding ceremony? Here are 50. How about interpretations of the Akedah, the binding of Isaac, in Genesis? Wait – over 200.

So what does this technology bring us? A richness of resources? An overwhelming but uncurated collection of material? A dumbing down? A smartening up? Yes and yes! In truth, we are still in the throes of this revolution. We cannot yet assess how it will change our ways of learning, thinking and relating to one another. But change them it will, just as did the previous technology revolution – the printing press.

How will this affect our Jewish lives? Well, the printing press did not kill Torah. Instead, industrialized printing enabled the proliferation of Bible, commentaries and other things Jewish. More economical and quicker to produce than hand-written scrolls and folios, printed volumes facilitated study. But they also changed the way people engaged. Literacy displaced memory – or, to put it differently, reading began to replace memorization and recitation.

The sensory experience of learning shifted with the move from recitation to reading. With recitation, space and time are important. We must gather together at the hour and location where recitation takes place, stand or sit as the setting and protocols permit, and hear the same words. The ear, the voice, the breath come into play. We constitute community because we literally come together, and because we partake of the same sensorium.

Reading introduces a tension between individual and community. We choose the space, time and duration. But we can converse with folks in many places about what we've read. We become a community of readers, bound not by geography and time, but by our minds.

Even as Jewish learning embraced the opportunities of print technology, Jewish ritual retained earlier learning practices. Rather than fading into artifact, the scroll and its recitation maintained a crucial role in the enactment of Jewish community and spiritually. In retrospect, Judaism accomplished an important feat, embracing both the new and the old.

Still in their infancy, today's and tomorrow's new technologies will change how we learn, think and constitute community in ways we can't yet anticipate. Our challenge will be to embrace what they make possible, but to hold onto what they threaten to eclipse. ■

I guess you missed the joke

Michael Taube

For my first CJN column of 2015, I'll be dealing with something I wrote about in 2014.

A strange way to start the new year? Yes, but I wanted to set the record straight on a piece that was unfortunately misinterpreted. It's a rare occurrence when I need to issue a mea culpa, but this is one of those moments.

Briefly, I wrote a column in November about the Jewish political shift from the Liberals to the Tories in the 2011 federal election. To be provocative, I attempted to show that this phenomenon may have some historical roots.

I brought up the example of the "first Jewish Liberal-Conservative," Henry Nathan, Jr. The B.C. Liberal MP was the first Jew ever elected to the House of Commons. At the same time, he strongly supported Sir John A. Macdonald and the Conservatives – or, as they used to be called, the Liberal-Conservatives.

Nathan had valid personal and political reasons for siding with Canada's first prime minister. Even so, I still wrote, "Did this political shift suddenly occur with the [Stephen] Harper Tories, or has it been going on since Macdonald's time? You decide."

For the record, I was just trying to have some fun. I've written extensively about Canadian politics, and the history of Canadian conservatism, for nearly 20 years. This includes comparisons of Red Tories and Blue Tories, fiscal conservatives and social conservatives, right-leaning political parties, and every Tory PM from Macdonald to Harper.

Hence, I know that Nathan was never a Tory. I know that the Macdonald Conservatives were politically and ideologically different from the Harper Tories. As well, I know – and have even mentioned it in this publication – that the Jewish political shift to the Tories can be primarily traced to the 2011 federal election.

So, what happened? I assumed readers would understand I was being edgy and provocative. Some people did, thank goodness. Others didn't.

In particular, it was Bernie Farber's rebuttal column that caught my eye.

It may surprise some people, but I've always liked and respected Farber. While it's true that his political and economic views are "radically different" than mine (no arguments there, Bernie!), he provides an alternative perspective on various issues. I've always been pleased to read his work, and the fact that I rarely agree with him is rather trivial in the grand scheme of things.

Farber has also been a strong defender of the Canadian Jewish community and was the last CEO of the now-defunct Canadian Jewish Congress. He, along with Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs CEO Shimon Fogel, recently retired B'nai Brith CEO Frank Dimant and newly appointed B'nai Brith CEO Michael Mostyn (who, as fate would have it, is a cousin of mine), all deserve respect. They've earned it.

That being said, when Farber wrote about my "rather fantastical theory that Jews have been moving into the political Conservative fold gradually, as opposed to in what most pundits have agreed has been a major and sudden shift of allegiance," I was stunned. When someone who has read my work for years misinterprets my position, I know I've done something wrong.

In many ways, it's my own doing. I tend to be a serious writer and thinker, mixing in the occasional lighthearted and/or dark comedic line or paragraph. I may have a sense of humour, but I'm definitely not a comedian.

More to the point, all I needed to do was add a small reference to show that I was teasing. It's a rookie mistake to assume that an audience is in on the joke. I'm not a rookie, and have the grey hair and war wounds to prove it. Hence, I should have known better.

Could I have swept this entire matter under the rug? Easily, but that's not my style.

So, I'm sorry. I'll be more clear in the future. And that's no joke. ■

Arava oil spill has many impacts and lessons

Paul Kay

Consider this scenario: a petroleum pipeline crosses a political entity. Its charge of crude oil originates outside that state, destined for use perhaps in that state or, more likely, beyond its borders. There is a break in the pipe, and large quantities of oil leak onto the land and into the water table of this in-between state. Sensitive ecological systems are damaged or threatened, economic costs are large and political oversight is revealed to be compromised.

It sounds like the basis for the plot of a political thriller or a scenario concocted by opponents of the XL Pipeline in the United States, the Northern Gateway project in British Columbia or Enbridge's Line 9 through Toronto. But in fact, just such an event occurred in the south of Israel last month.

On Dec. 3, a breach in a 42-inch pipe of the Trans-Israel Pipeline began leaking crude oil near the small Arava community of Be'er Ora. Almost immediately, Israel's Ministry of Environmental Protection called the situation "one of the gravest pollution events in the country's history." There were at least three major reasons for such an assessment: environmental, economic and political.

Some 5 million litres of oil leaked nearly seven kilometres south into the Evrona Nature Preserve. The Arava is extremely arid. Lines of acacia trees mark the dry watercourses, which flood in rare rain events. Acacias are an important food resource for desert insects, rodents, larger mammals and birds, including the vast number of migrants that follow the valley twice a year. Acacias are also shallow-rooted, so even if quick action is successful in vacuuming most of the oil that has pooled on the surface, residual oil that seeps into the soil may threaten their survival.

It was feared the oil might also reach Eilat, some 20 kilometre away, threatening the Red Sea coral reefs. Hard work succeeded in building containment berms, spreading absorptive materials, and pumping up pooled oil to avert this threat. However, environmental damage was done at Evrona, and the long-term prospects are unclear.

Economic concerns are multi-faceted. There is the lost revenue from those millions of litres of oil and the costs of emergency response. The company and the ministry may be sued for damages. Hidden costs may also include long-term health effects. Although air quality monitoring suggests there was no threat to residents in Eilat, high levels of benzene were noted at the site of the spill. And there was at least one report of 80 people being hospitalized in Aqaba, Jordan, due to exposure to hydrogen sulphide.

The Eilat-Ashkelon pipeline was built in the 1960s to transport Iranian oil across Israel, mostly for sale to European markets. Although that arrangement with Iran ceased with the overthrow of the Shah in 1979, oil continues to enter the pipeline. The Eilat-Ashkelon Pipeline Company (EAPC), established to market Persian oil via Israel, is a private company that operates opaquely due to outdated laws: the 1952 oil law did not contemplate environmental concerns, and a 1968 government order declares EAPC's operations confidential (supposedly for geopolitical security reasons), which also protects it from enforcement of environmental regulations. Indeed, the Nature and Parks Administration and the city of Eilat, professed ignorance of what the pipeline carries. Interlocking relationships between members of the government and civil service and the directorship of the EAPC further complicate the situation.

Pipelines will leak. No mechanical system lasts without constant maintenance and oversight. On the scale of known oil disasters elsewhere, the Arava leak is quite small. But the damage to local environment, the costs of clean-up and remediation, and the damage to political relationships – and the trust of citizens in government – are nonetheless important to consider.

We need to get oil from source to point of use. But we must do so in a trustworthy and environmentally conscious way. ■

Opinions vary on USY interdating policy change

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

United Synagogue Youth's (USY) recent decision to amend the language in its constitution concerning interfaith dating for its teen leaders has Conservative rabbis and movement members debating the implications of the move.

Late last month, 750 teens came to Atlanta for the USY international convention, and the Conservative youth movement's board voted to adopt a number of new amendments, including a controversial change to the wording of its interdating policy.

"They had a standard for leadership that used to say USY leaders should refrain from dating that might be construed as interdating," said Rabbi Steven Wernick, CEO of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

"The new language says that USY leaders should strive to make healthy Jewish dating choices, including the recognition of the importance of dating Jews and treating all people Betzelem Elokim, in the image of God… The old ruling was 'thou shalt not,' and the new ruling is 'thou shall.'"

Rabbi Wernick explained that the amendments were drafted by USY teens who have been working on it for nearly a year, seeking guidance from sources ranging from their peers to prominent rabbis.

"They processed the input, talked about the pros and cons, and ran an excellent meeting," Rabbi Wernick said.

"There were 42 present for the final discussion and vote, but the standards affect less than 100 kids. They affect the kids who wish to become regional officers or international officers or board members… It was a true constitutional process. This is all about the teens wrestling with… how to connect traditions to their awareness of their realities. That's what this was about."

He said to the best of his knowledge, the former interdating clause had never been enforced to the point of having to dismiss any USY leaders on the grounds that they were dating a non-Jew.

"But I do know that people were discouraged from running for office if they couldn't commit to that, and I can tell you that we are going to continue to review with those who wish to run for regional or national office that these are the standards USY has set for themselves and we want people to understand them and acknowledge them and commit [to the idea] that if they are going to be a leader, this is what they are going to do," Rabbi Wernick said.

Rabbi Stephen Schwarzman, spiritual leader of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, Ont., which is home to a USY chapter, said he doesn't think the change in the wording of the policy will have a serious effect on the movement as a whole.

"I think it's an effort to be in step with the times, and when I say that, I don't mean it negatively, I mean it positively. The previous language was negative, and they replaced it with positive language," said the American-born Rabbi Schwarzman, who came to Toronto last year after serving congregations in Maine and Massachusetts.

"I know as a rabbi… especially in the U.S. – less so here in Canada – there are not a whole lot of conversations you can have that begin with the language of [what's] forbidden… What you have to do as a rabbi is recognize that we live in an open… society. No one is required to be Jewish anymore. Those who choose to be Jewish need to be motivated and inspired, and I think that their decision to go from negative language to positive language is probably part of that," he said.

Rabbi Steven Wernick

"I do appreciate how different Canadian Jewry is from American Jewry. We speak the same language, and for all intents and purposes, we look and sound the same, but things here really are different… There is an intensity and involvement in the Canadian community that I've seen so far, and the American community would do very well if they could emulate it."

The spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Rabbi Jarrod Grover, is not as forgiving.

"I think this shows a weakening of the movement's principles… and I am appalled about what happened," Rabbi Grover said.

"Remember that a week before [USY voted to amend its policy], there was a big controversy in the movement because a rabbi at a prominent Conservative synagogue in Boston suggested that he would be conducting interfaith marriages. So in the midst of this, to come out with softer language is part of the struggle of the movement, which is dying in the States," he said.

Rabbi Grover added that the movement is struggling to find a balance between adhering to its religious principles and becoming as welcoming as possible.

"I think that this move on the part of USY – again it affects hardly any people – it is not going to have any real impact, but it sends a message about the direction of the movement's leadership – that they are afraid to state what they are about and what they are not about," he said.

"Everyone says it is not a real change, it doesn't say anything, it's just language. Then why would you do it? You're doing it because you're afraid to say what you disagree with. Because to draw a line is to exclude people, and what it so bad about excluding people? I think it is important that the movement knows what it believes in, as it should know what it does not believe in, and that's the problem. That we are afraid to say what we do not believe in." ■

BRINGING THE LIGHT OF TORAH AND WARMTH OF MITZVOT TO JEWS EVERYWHERE

GUEST VOICE

USY interdating change signals respect, inclusivity

EMMA PASCOE

At their recent international convention, teen leaders of the Conservative movement's United Synagogue Youth (USY) group from around North America voted to amend their constitution, adding changes to the list of standards of behaviour that USY leaders agree to when they assume their positions.

I can imagine the excitement at this meeting, since I was a USYer not too long ago, serving in various positions on the Eastern Canadian Region (ECRUSY) executive board, including as president in my final year of USY, as well as a year on the social action/tikkun olam international general board. We planned activities, Shabbatons and conventions for other high school students, organized social action and community service programs, and advocated for Israel. After high school, I remained involved with USY as a staff member with ECRUSY, and I've been able to watch my brother, sister and USYers that I led grow into leaders in USY and in the Jewish community.

USY leaders sign a contract, colloquially called "standards." These standards, created by USYers themselves, acknowledge that USY is a Jewish youth group and that its leaders should act as Jewish role models. Until recently, the standards consisted of upholding Jewish laws of kashrut, Shabbat and holiday observance, as well as the more general values of avoiding drugs and underage drinking. They also expected that leaders "will refrain from relationships which can be construed as interdating."

Last month, USY leaders from across North America chose to recognize additional Jewish values of avoiding lashon hara (gossip), zero tolerance for bullying and treating each other with kavod (respect). Continuing in this vein of inclusivity and respect, the language of the interdating standard was changed to "The officers will strive to model healthy Jewish dating choices. These include recognizing the importance of dating within the Jewish community and treating each person with the recognition that they were created Betzelem Elokim, in the image of God."

This last point has raised the ire of some who feel interdating should be a hard and fast line that's not crossed. With Jews comprising such a small proportion of the population, the idea that much of the next generation may not be raising Jewish families is a concern. However, in my view, encouraging lifelong ties to the Jewish community is best done by creating positive associations to traditions, not by using negative language.

USYers aren't denying that dating within the faith is an important principle. However, they note that some USYers come from families where only one parent may have grown up in a Jewish home, or who may have at one point had a relationship with a non-Jew. Rather than alienating those teens by treating interdating as a strict taboo, the new language preserves the principle that dating within the faith ensures continuity while acknowledging that it's a sensitive subject. By focusing on respect and creating wonderful memories associated with Shabbat and other aspects of Judaism, USY instils lifelong Jewish values in today's teens.

As a former USYer and ECRUSY staff member, I can appreciate how challenging it is to spread the word about USY and the importance of being involved in the Conservative Jewish community, so I was excited to see USY mentioned in the media. I was confused, however, by the focus on the negative implications of the amended standards. For me, these new amendments represent the opposite.

USY has been a way for me and other young Jews to get involved in our religion, traditions and community, to develop leadership skills and to make wonderful friendships. The amendments to the standards show that high school students want to stay involved in their community and are willing to be dugmaot (role models). Jewish values teach us about the importance of a kehillah, community, and to respect one another. The amendments demonstrate that these values of respect and inclusivity are alive and well in today's Conservative Jewish youth. That's something to celebrate. ■

Youth clubs still meet some 70 years later

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Some 70 years plus have passed and youth clubs established at the YMHA (now the JCC) in Toronto in the late 1930s still exist today.

"That is more than friendship. I call it brotherhood," says Ken Borden, a member of one of the clubs, Club Kenton.

Borden, who heads an advertising agency and is a born leader, says it is an unbelievable closeness. "It is a comfort zone, second to none."

Back then, the clubs had Saturday socials and Sunday meetings, put on musical shows, raised money for charity and had interclub sports.

Borden told The CJN that when the members of Club Kenton get together now, usually monthly and for each birthday, they often look back at the past and see how things develop and grow.

They plan social events and attend each other's family events – bar mitzvahs, weddings, brit milahs and funerals – and they visit each other in hospitals and attend family shivahs.

"The closeness is still there, only now it's very much love, a caring and wanting to stay together.

"Here we are, all seniors-plus, and still having and sharing fun together with the kids we grew up with. Whatever we had, whatever we did, it worked, and still does."

There was a joint all-clubs reunion in 2002. "And it only took us about 65 years to put it together. We were rivals when we were kids, in sports, socials, school and dating.

"We now do sports, spectators now, and socials, but no more dating, as we are a little tired.

"Our get-togethers are a blast. There's lots of hugging, lots of hand shaking, lots of laughs and above all, the real definition of brotherhood."

Looking back, Borden says when he was growing up in the 1930s and '40s, the war years, Jewish Toronto was a small world, St. Clair Avenue to the north, Lake Ontario to the south, Yonge Street to the east and Dovercourt Road to the west.

"We rarely strayed outside these boundaries. Outside was very uncomfortable. Anti-Semitism was big and visible, and we kept to our own little world where we felt safe."

He explains that in 1944, he and some friends went to hear a Stan Kenton concert at Crystal Beach. "The sound was amazing, so our club changed its name to Club Kenton."

They followed the Stan Kenton concerts and wore their Kenton sweaters, white with a red K, which brought them an introduction to Kenton.

With gratitude, Borden spoke of the benefits and the protection of the YMHA, which was located on Brunswick Avenue at College Street. "It was our home away from home and our shelter from the outside stormy blast of our adversaries."

It is amazing that those clubs are still alive and thriving in Toronto, he says "Many of the members had nicknames, Spider, the Mole, Itch, Wild Bill, Clutch, Jiggs, Shnoz, Racco and many more, and we still joke about those names today."

Borden calls it "a mysterious magnet" that still draws them together.

"It is the richest part of my social life and I wouldn't trade that for all the electronic programs today that separate people." ■

Meir Medical to honour premier at gala

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The last time supporters of the Meir Medical Center in Israel got together at gala dinners, they raised $2.5 million for the Kfar Saba-based regional hospital.

This time, an estimated 500 guests are expected at a fundraising dinner in October 2015 and the target being set in the campaign is $1 million, said Arie Raif, vice-chair and CEO of Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Center.

The money is slated to go towards the construction of a new orthopedic hospital at the centre, which is affiliated with the Sackler Faculty of Medicine at Tel Aviv University (TAU), and which serves about 10 per cent of the Israeli population.

Two prominent Ontarians – Premier Kathleen Wynne and neurosurgeon Dr. Michael Fehlings – will be honoured at the dinner. They have been named recipients of the Meir Medical Center's Medals of Merit awards. Two other recipients will be named in the future, said Raif.

"Wynne has supported us for the last five years, not only as premier but as an MPP," said Raif. "She cares about Israel, she shows support not only in words but in action – in the expansion of trade and the expansion of relations between the province and Israel."

"Prof. Fehlings is a world-renowned neurosurgeon" active in stem cell research, Raif continued. "His research labs are something to be admired."

Fehlings serves as head of the spinal program at the Toronto Western Hospital, which is part of the University Health Network. A professor of neurosurgery at the University of Toronto, Fehlings also holds the Gerry and Tootsie Halbert chair in neural repair and regeneration. In 2014, he was appointed vice-chair of research at the department of surgery at the University of Toronto. He leads a multi-disciplinary team examining the application of stem cells, nano-technology and tissue engineering for central nervous system repair and regeneration.

Raif is hopeful the gala dinner can build the relationship between Meir hospital, TAU's faculty of medicine, and Fehlings. "He's been invited to speak to the Israeli Neurological Society. As a guest speaker he came back impressed with Israeli know-how, progress and research."

"We're trying to connect him to Meir for spinal surgery and other issues. Our possibilities with Prof. Fehlings are endless. We can create a lot of connections," Raif said.

The $1-million fundraising goal for the gala is part of a $100-million budget for Meir Medical's orthopedic wing and emergency department. Half is being contributed by the Israeli government, and the other half is the responsibility of Meir Medical and its support groups worldwide.

The new orthopedic and emergency building will include 99 care stations in its emergency department; nine operating rooms; two orthopedic hospitalization departments; two orthopedic rehabilitation departments; a spinal surgery department; outpatient clinics; a pain treatment clinic; and a rheumatology unit.

Last year's gala raised funds in part for the Children's Hospital and for cardiology equipment. Meir Medical treats nearly 50,000 children annually, from newborns to 18-year-olds. Comparable in size to Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre, it's located in central Israel north of Tel Aviv. The 863-bed hospital serves 58,400 inpatients a year and performs 20,000 surgical procedures annually. It's one of the largest emergency hospitals in the country.

Kathleen Wynne

It prides itself in providing excellent service to all, regardless of religion or nationality. Twenty per cent of the hospital's patients and staff are non-Jews.

This has made it attractive to non-Jewish supporters, who give substantially to the facility's Canadian campaign, Raif said.

Overall, supporters realize their contributions make the difference between life and death, particularly in times of conflict.

"During war, the hospitals in Israel are the most important element that have to be protected, that have to be modern," he said. Future campaigns will focus on making the hospital more able to withstand rocket attacks, Raif said. ■

Cuba overture could change charitable landscape

plungen@thecjn.ca

It may not happen tomorrow or the day after, but some day in the foreseeable future, American Jews will step to the plate and deliver to their co-religionists in Cuba the goods and products that today are provided by Canadian Jews, says Bernie Farber.

Farber, former CEO of the defunct Canadian Jewish Congress, was commenting in the aftermath of the announcement by U.S President Barack Obama that he was easing diplomatic restrictions on Cuba, located about 90 miles south of Florida.

Although the U.S. trade embargo remains in place, Farber is convinced the trend is for an opening of relations with the island nation. And that will make it more likely that U.S. Jewish groups and individuals will step in and do for their Cuban co-religionists what Canadian Jews have been doing for 53 years.

Since 1962, around the same time the United States began to isolate the Communist government in Cuba, Canadian Jews have been shipping kosher food products to assist the tiny Jewish community.

Over the years, Cuban Jews – dubbed "Jubans" by singer Gloria Estefan, who used to perform in the wedding and bar mitzvah circuit in Miami – have received Passover products on an annual basis from Canada. In addition, Canadian Jews ship vital items such as pharmaceuticals, both over the counter and prescription items, as well as jeans, toothpaste, deodorant, bras and other necessities the Communist regime can't produce.

In addition to community-sanctioned effort, operated through Congress while it existed and now by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, individual Jews flying to Cuba sometimes bring suitcases filled with badly needed consumer items.

But it would make more sense, from a logistical perspective and because many of Cuba's 15,000 Jews fled to Florida after the revolution, for that effort to be taken up by American Jews, said Farber, whose son, Max, had his bar mitzvah in Cuba in 2006.

On Dec. 17, Obama pledged to ease the U.S. trade embargo on Cuba and begin the move toward full diplomatic relations. The move is controversial in some quarters in the United States, not least among Cuban expatriates, who argue sanctions are needed to undermine the island's Communist government. In the wake of the U.S. announcement, the Cuban government arrested several human rights activists, they noted.

> If other communities will do it and do it more efficiently from a logistics and cost standpoint, we will pay heed to that. In the next few months, we'll ascertain to see if that will happen.

Proponents of the thaw argue the United States maintains diplomatic and economic relations with many unsavoury regimes.

Farber believes Obama's overture is likely "the first step to the end of the trade embargo."

As restrictions on ties with Cuba diminish, "You could see a strengthening of the [Jewish] community," he said.

The 1,500 Cuban Jews don't have access to a rabbi or teachers, to a shoichet or a cantor. And as far as food aid goes, it makes more sense to ship it from nearby Florida than distant Toronto, he said.

The Canadian Jewish community began to assist Cuban Jews at the request of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). At the time, senior Congress professional Ben Kayfetz raised funds for Cuban aid in Toronto synagogues that were used to buy kosher Passover products, which were shipped "by slow boat to Cuba," Farber said.

Today, about $40,000 in goods are sent annually, including items such as gefilte fish, horseradish, matzah, matzah meal, canned tuna and soup mixes, said Cindy Osheroff, CIJA's logistics co-ordinator for the "Maot Chittin" program.

The goods are purchased in Toronto with funds raised through UJA Federation, then shipped to Halifax and sent by container ship, she said. They are received at the El Patronato synagogue, known also as Gran Sinagoga Bet Shalom, where they're distributed to Jews.

"Cuban Jews are very grateful" for the annual shipment, Osheroff said.

For at least the last 12 years, since she's been involved with the program, additional funds totalling $3,000 have been provided by a New York-based charitable organization for other items she said.

With the opening of U.S. relations, Osheroff suggested "a great idea would be for North American Jewish federations to mount a joint effort" for Cuban Jews.

UJA campaign director Steven Shulman said the funds for Cuban Jews are raised as part of UJA's "global seder to fight hunger" campaign.

It's too early to tell whether the U.S. diplomatic overture will see U.S. organizations stepping in to help, he said.

"If other communities will do it and do it more efficiently from a logistics and cost standpoint, we will pay heed to that," he said. "In the next few months, we'll ascertain to see if that will happen."

The JDC re-entered Cuba in 1991, at the invitation of the local community.

In addition to the annual Canadian aid shipment, the JDC provides pharmaceuticals, which are distributed as well to the island's non-Jewish population, as well as weekly chicken dinners, said JDC spokesperson Michael Geller.

'We hope that this is a step in the right direction'

JDC also supports bar and bat mitzvahs by bringing in rabbis to officiate, he said.

Michael Soberman, vice-president of the Canada Israel Experience, an agency funded by Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA, said Canadian Jews have also played a role in linking Cuban Jews to Israel.

Almost every year since 2003, young Cubans fly to Toronto and join Canadian participants in Birthright, the annual subsidized trip to Israel for young people. Since the program began, some 120 Cubans have taken part, with a large number eventually making aliyah, Soberman said.

The Birthright connection has led to other joint programming, in which young Canadian leaders travel to Cuba to interact with their Cuban contemporaries, he added.

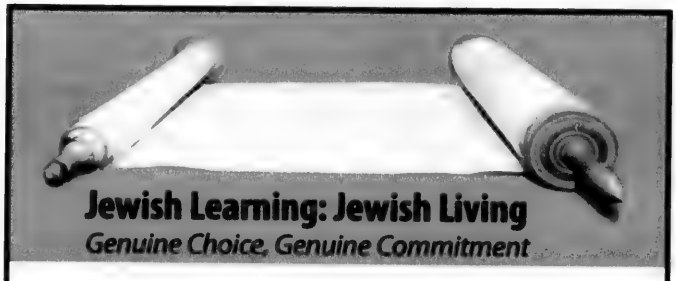
The Canadian-Cuban Jewish connection has support at the state level. As part of Operation Cigar, "the Canadian embassy had facilitated the immigration of Cuban Jews to Israel," Farber said.

American Jewish groups are monitoring the developing situation closely. If the doors to Cuba open, "it will be easier to have back-and-forth contact [that] will surely enable a deeper and more fluid relationship including the presence of its members in global Jewish forums and travel to Israel," said Dina Siegel Vann, director of the American Jewish Committee's (AJC) Belfer Center for Latino and Latin American Affairs.

"[Like] the rest of the Cubans, Jews will be able to benefit from the U.S. plans for increased connectivity and tourism," she said.

"From AJC's perspective, we hope that this is a step in the right direction after 50 years of a policy which did not bring about the changes everybody aspired for. This is a process which ultimately should hopefully lead to increased democratic rule, human rights, freedom, open trade and mutually beneficial relations between Cuba, the United States and the rest of the hemisphere," she stated.

But as for the American Jewish community supplanting the Canadian in their support for Cubans, Soberman said, "It might make some sense for them to partner with their friends and cousins in south Florida. But I don't imagine anything would change imminently... Nothing happens in Cuba quickly. I imagine it will take some time." ■



Jewish Learning: Jewish Living
Genuine Choice, Genuine Commitment

A multi-denominational course, ideal for those exploring the possibility of conversion to Judaism

Each person's journey towards Judaism is organic and individual. We invite you to explore Judaism and your growing relationship with it through the lenses of different Jewish denominations.

This course introduces the central Jewish ideas and practices, texts and experiences that form the foundation of a Jewish life. If you decide to pursue conversion, this course will give you the tools to choose an informed, healthy and whole commitment to Jewish living and the Jewish people.

This year-long, biweekly course is solely an educational endeavor. Enrolling does not guarantee conversion. An individual who chooses to pursue conversion will choose a mentoring rabbi/educator and will continue the process based on the rabbi/educator's specific denominational requirements.

Greenspan remembered for courtroom skills, humour

Renowned criminal defence lawyer Eddie Greenspan died in his sleep last week while on vacation with his family in Phoenix, Ariz. He was 70.

Greenspan was remembered for his high-profile cases, his advocacy on important constitutional issues, and for a wicked sense of humour that he sometime employed in court. Members of his family, delivering eulogies at his funeral last weekend at Beth Torah Synagogue in Toronto, said he'd always enjoyed comedy and jokes and instructed them to continue that tradition at his funeral.

His daughter, Julianna, honoured his wishes.

"It made him crazy that he couldn't give his own eulogy," she told the 800 people present. "He gave me an order: 'When I die you must be funny, very funny, no sentimental BS.'

"If my father knew the outpouring of press coverage would have been so enormous, he would have faked his death years ago," she quipped.

"Eddie was a hilarious guy. There was absolutely nothing sacred to him," said his close friend George Jonas. "If it gave him the opportunity for a good line – and frankly even when the line wasn't that good – Eddie would go for it in a flash."

One courtroom quote attributed to Greenspan when the prosecution had a weak case was, "I wish I was as thin as the evidence against my client in this case."

Jonas, who wrote Greenspan: The Case for the Defence, knew the Toronto lawyer for 40 years.

"The law was everything to him. He often said that he mentioned to his wife that she would be his mistress because he was married to the law. It was obviously a joke, but he was married to the law."

Greenspan played prominent roles in a number of high-profile cases, including those involving wife killer Helmut Buxbaum, businessman and lobbyist Karlheinz Schreiber, media entrepreneur Garth Drabinsky and Saskatchewan farmer Robert Latimer.

"He was also fascinated by show business in a way I never was, even though I was in show business," Jonas said.

For his part, Jonas was interested in legal matters. At one point, Jonas traded his subscription of Variety magazine to Greenspan in exchange for his copy of Dominion Law Reports, which Greenspan edited.

> I had no childhood dreams of being a fireman, a policeman, teacher, doctor or candlestick maker or a corporate mogul. I was committed to being not only a lawyer, but a criminal lawyer

Leo Adler met Greenspan while he was still a law student and Greenspan was a junior lawyer working with Joe Pomerant on the Peter Demeter trial. "It's the case that made him," Adler said.

Jonas co-authored a book on the case, By Persons Unknown: The Strange Death Of Christine Demeter, which highlighted Greenspan's contribution to the case, Adler said.

Jonas and Greenspan went on to collaborate on The Scales of Justice, a CBC production that dramatized high-profile legal cases, including several on which Adler worked.

Adler played himself in one episode. The taping went on past midnight, after which he joined Jonas and Greenspan for a late night coffee and doughnuts.

"Eddie would then go back to the office. He had a full bedroom set up in his office, since there were times he would go back and work and prepare," Adler said.

Daniel Brodsky articled for Greenspan in the late 1980s, around the time Greenspan's biography was released. Greenspan presented him with a copy of the book, with the inscription, "Don't read the book this year. You won't have time."

"I thought he was kidding," Brodsky said, but "it was no joke. Two or three days later, I was sitting in a doughnut shop downtown at two o'clock in the morning while Eddie rehearsed his jury address to whoever was in the doughnut shop, willing to listen.

"He was intense. There was a reason he got the nickname Fast Eddie. It was because Eddie seemed to be everywhere, doing everything."

As part of his job, Brodsky accompanied Greenspan on a cross-country book tour that coincided with cases Greenspan scheduled in each city. Greenspan would start the day enjoying a shave in a barbershop, while being briefed by Brodsky on cases he had coming up. From there, he'd go to the radio station, talk about the book, and then head to the courthouse before catching a plane to the next destination.

Greenspan was adept at surrounding himself with competent people who provided him with case research and prepared him for court. He was sort of like a conductor leading an orchestra, Brodsky said.

Among those who articled for him were Marc Rosenberg, who currently is a justice on the Ontario Court of Appeal, and fellow Niagara Falls resident and prominent lawyer Alan Gold.

In a 2006 article in Canadian Business Magazine, Greenspan outlined his views on the practice of law and the reasons he got into it.

"I had no childhood dreams of being a fireman, a policeman, teacher, doctor or candlestick maker or a corporate mogul. I was committed to being not only a lawyer, but a criminal lawyer," he said.

"The allure, the show business part of criminal law, the great trials, cross-examinations, jury addresses that I had read about in all the books when I was growing up, that made me want to become a criminal lawyer, like Perry Mason – none of them talked about the truth. And the truth is that for every great one hour of cross-examination, you have to spend about 50 hours preparing alone in your office, late at night, when no one else is around and you can think it through, take notes.

"It's completely unglamorous and completely nothing more or less than very hard work. You've got to read everything, think about everything, figure out how you're going to approach a case and then get up and make it look like it's natural, like it just kind of came to you, which, of course, it doesn't if you care about what you're doing."

Adler recalled Greenspan as "a very good cross-examiner. Going back to his sense of humour, he had a very good sense of timing. He was very theatrical."

End of an era as Pripstein's camp closes in Quebec

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Pripstein's Camp Mishmar, the last of the private, co-ed sleepaway camps in the Laurentians that catered to an anglophone, mainly Jewish, clientele has closed after 74 years.

Majority owner Ronnie Braverman, grandson of founders, Chaim and Pearl Pripstein, said enrolment has been declining at the camp since the Parti Québécois was first elected in 1976 and the anglophone exodus accelerated.

In the 1970s, families also began to stop sending their kids to camp for the whole summer, opting instead to spend part of the season on family vacations, said Braverman, who began working with his grandfather in the business 42 years ago.

He estimates 90 per cent of campers and 70 per cent of staff have been Jewish.

Over its history, Pripstein's, as it is usually known, served more than 7,000 children and counsellors, he said. At its peak in the 1960s, there were an average of 240 campers. That number has dipped to as low as half that number, but has settled around 180 in recent years.

Early registration for the coming season was down to the point where Braverman realized the camp was no longer economically viable.

The demographics are simply not there. Braverman estimates that two-thirds to three-quarters of former campers and counsellors, the most ready source of a new generation of customers, are not living in Montreal anymore, he said.

The camp is located on 200 acres in St. Adolphe d'Howard, about an hour north of Montreal.

"When I first joined my grandfather in the business over 40 years ago, the Laurentians were one of the booming centres of the Canadian camping scene," he said. "There were over a dozen privately operated, co-ed English camps dotting the countryside."

They have all disappeared. Among the best known are Hiawatha, Pembina, Bayview, Panorama and, in more recent years, Pine Valley and Maromac, which also catered to a mainly Jewish clientele. By 2007, Pripstein's was the only one of its kind still operating, Braverman said.

He did try recruiting campers from abroad, and some from the United States, Latin America, Europe, Israel, Asia and, surprisingly, Saudi Arabia, did enrol – but not enough.

"Another hit to the business side was the introduction of the GST and PST sales taxes," he said. "We lost 20 families the first year of the GST, who fled to nearby American camps, which had, and still have, no sales taxes. We were forced to eat the taxes to maintain market share, and this obliterated much of our profit margin."

Pripstein's Camp Mishmar is located on 200 wooded acres in the Laurentians.

Pripstein's also targets middle-class families. The wealthy tend toward prestigious camps in the United States, and those of lower incomes go to community-subsidized camps, he pointed out.

Among the more famous Pripstein's alumni that come to Braverman's mind are singer-songwriter Leonard Cohen, who was a counsellor in 1958; Indigo bookstores head Heather Reisman, who was a camper; former senator Hugh Segal taught photography there; and, from a younger generation, novelist Sarah Mlynowski.

Pripstein's always had a strong sports program and attracted some top-flight staff, including Emerson Thomas, who played professional basketball in Europe, and Corey Pecker, who played professional hockey on that continent. Pecker ran Pripstein's hockey camp. A summer-use ice rink was one of the innovations in which Braverman invested to try to keep the camp going.

Chaim Pripstein immigrated to Montreal from Poland before World War II. He was initially a teacher at the Talmud Torah, but when it could no longer pay salaries during the Depression, he became a pedlar. His itinerary included the rural area around St. Jérôme, north of Montreal. He sometimes stayed overnight at a farmer's house there, and in 1941, he hit on the idea of creating a modest summer-vacation pension for Montreal families in one of the farmer's buildings, buying the food from him, Braverman related. Over time, it became solely a children's camp.

When the North River on which it was located became polluted, Pripstein bought land on the camp's current site further north, which has been added to over the years. The name Mishmar is derived from the Hebrew for standing on guard.

In the early years, the camp only served kosher meat, Braverman said, but Pripstein's never had a hechsher. Over the years, that evolved into "kosher-style," but rituals such as lighting Shabbat candles were maintained.

Since announcing the closure last month, Braverman said he has received "hundreds upon hundreds of heartfelt, nostalgic emails, phone calls, texts and Facebook posts from around the world, from campers, counsellors and parents.

"It's nice to see we made an impact on so many people's lives."

Braverman has made arrangements with Camp Walden in Palmer Rapids, Ont., about four hours from Montreal to accept Pripstein's campers and much of its staff. Owned by Sol Birenbaum and Howie Grossinger, Camp Walden is much larger, but can offer a similar camp experience and the owners are "friendly and caring people," Braverman said. ■

Lessons from the interdating ruling: A CJN conversation

During Shabbat services on Jan. 3 at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto, the synagogue's spiritual leader Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl and his associate, Rabbi Adam Cutler, addressed amendments to the standards of behaviour expected of some international and regional officers of United Synagogue Youth (USY). Ahead of the discussion, both rabbis shared their thoughts with The CJN.

Rabbi Adam Cutler

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl: Why did the USY amendment get such attention?

Rabbi Cutler: To begin, it's important to understand what was changed: previously the 100 or so individuals affected by the standards of conduct were expected to "refrain from relationships which can be construed as interdating." The new language specifies that these officers "will strive to model healthy Jewish dating choices. These include recognizing the importance of dating within the Jewish community and treating each person with the recognition that they were created Betzelem Elokim (in the image of God)."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl: I thought the former language was a red line that clearly prohibited interfaith dating. The new language seems less definitive.

Rabbi Cutler: For those who liked the old wording, a generous reading of the amendment would result in no practical change. Interdating was and continues to be forbidden to those in certain leadership positions.

However, to those who want to parse the words like a page of Talmud, one could see the old language as more clear and definitive ("expected," "will refrain"), while the new is aspirational ("strive to," "recognizing the importance of"). Based on my understanding of the word choices, the intent of the authors and several conversations with USY leaders, a subtle practical shift has, in fact, taken place.

There was a time when a USY leader who interdated would immediately be expected to resign; however, in recent years the extent to which this happened is negligible, as the old language created a culture wherein the very few USY leaders who interdated simply hid their romantic relationships. The new language, it is hoped, will open up space for conversation.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl: You are right. Over the years, the language of most secular educators has shifted from "don't do X" to "it is good to do Y." So has the style of most rabbis and Jewish educators. We want to encourage desired activity rather than to emphasize what people shouldn't do.

Rabbi Cutler: These high schoolers are much more sensitive to the growing nature of religiously blended families and families in which one parent converted to Judaism. They reasonably felt the need to devise expectations that welcomed active, committed young Jews into leadership positions even when one of their parents is not Jewish or was not Jewish at the time when their parents started dating.

If anything, our synagogues could learn from these teenagers about how to create a welcoming community without surrendering values we hold dear. USY is way ahead of the curve when it comes to what type of religious and ethical behaviour we expect of our leadership.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl: I think that the impetus for the interest in this story is the renewed debate in North America about the future of Jewish life here. The Pew Report last October painted a challenging picture of what people view as important to Jewish identity. In-marriage was down and intermarriage was up. I am among those who are not sanguine about our future. We have to articulate more clearly what Judaism is, why it is important and why people should marry and continue Jewish life.

This weekend was the yahrzeit of my teacher, Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel. In one of his last public remarks, he spoke about the future: "Young people are waiting, craving, searching for spiritual meaning. And our leadership is unable to respond, to guide, to illumine. With Zion as evidence and inspiration, as witness and example, a renewal of our people should come about."

We have to make it happen.

Rabbi Cutler: What does this debate say to you about the changing worldview and home life of today's young Conservative Jews? Is inclusion an ultimate value? Or is it counterbalanced by behavioural expectations?

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl: Bridges are important, but there also have to be borders. For years, I have spoken about a three-part approach to interfaith dating and marriage. We have to teach the value of marrying within "the tribe," emphasizing the importance of continuity of our covenant with God, cultural behaviour and religious belief. Just before his death, Rabbi Heschel asked rhetorically, "Who is a Jew?" He responded to his own question: "A person who knows how to recall and to keep alive what is holy in our people's past, and to cherish the promise and the vision of redemption in the days to come."

Second, we should encourage non-Jews in love with Jews to consider conversion to Judaism. We have a tradition of great spiritual depth and moral grandeur. Often the Jew-by-choice motivates the Jewish partner and his or her family to grow. It has certainly brought more Jews of colour into our community, enriching us with their ethnic and cultural backgrounds.

Finally, when there is no conversion, we should create welcoming spaces in our synagogues to encourage interfaith families to raise their children as Jews. Even as we seek inclusion, there have to be standards.

Rabbi Cutler: What about the future?

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl: Conservative Judaism provides an historically authentic approach to belief, behaviour and belonging. We have a balanced understanding of how our received traditions engage and interact with the larger world around us. Our communities are often very engaged in Jewish social ethics, but less knowledgeable or observant of the specifically ritual elements of Jewish life.

More than the debate about dating, we have to ask ourselves what will build a Jewish future. I look at the young people who are involved in USY and other youth program as the future leaders of our community.

You will be around longer than I. What is your hope for the future?

Rabbi Cutler: My hope is that our organizations are able to inspire Jews to live committed Jewish lives. I hope that such inspiration is predicated on the understanding that Judaism provides meaning to one's life.

As Jewish leaders, we must be able to convey, not that Jews should be Jewish in order that there be more Jews, but that Jews should be Jewish because Judaism has something substantive to add to the lives of its adherents and the world at large. Additionally, I want our organizations to reclaim the idea of mitzvah, not as a good deed, but as a sacred obligation. It is through the lived experience of commitment to community, to ritual and to God that one comes to see the power of Judaism. ■

Blocked at UN, Abbas seeks to join international court

TIMES OF ISRAEL AND CJN STAFF
JERUSALEM

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas signed on to the International Criminal Court (ICC) last week, one day after the UN Security Council rejected a resolution on Palestinian statehood.

The Palestinians fell one vote short of the minimum nine "yes" votes required for adoption by the 15-member council.

The move to join the ICC was made to "internationalize this conflict," according to Palestinian official Mohammed Shtayyeh.

If permitted to join the court, Palestinians would be able to file claims against individuals in the Israeli military and political leadership for alleged war crimes on Palestinian territory. In the request to join the ICC, Abbas asked the Hague-based court to investigate Israel retroactively for alleged war crimes starting from June 13, 2014 – the day after three Israeli teenagers were kidnapped and murdered by a Hamas cell in the West Bank, an unnamed NGO worker told Ha'aretz.

Chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said Israeli settlement construction and expansion would also be the subject of complaints to the ICC.

Canada criticized the Palestinians for attempting to join the ICC, while applauding the decision of the Security Council to reject the Palestinian bid for statehood.

"The decision by the Palestinian Authority (PA) to seek to unilaterally accede to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, among other international bodies, is a concerning and dangerous development," said Foreign Minister John Baird.

"Such a provocative decision only furthers the divide between Palestinians and Israelis, and will carry unfortunate consequences.

"The path chosen can be reversed, and instead, the Palestinian Authority can recommit to a negotiated solution. We believe this is the only way to bring about a just and lasting peace. Israelis and Palestinians deserve nothing less," Baird stated.

Though not currently a member of the Security Council, Canada had urged those with votes to reject the proposal for Palestinian statehood.

"The resolution that was submitted to the Security Council on Dec. 29 is just another attempt to circumvent negotiations and place preconditions on future discussions," Baird said in a news release.

"Canada therefore calls upon members of the Security Council to reject this resolution.

"We have long rejected unilateral action on either side, as we believe it is ultimately unhelpful to the cause of peace," he added.

France, China and Russia were among the countries on the Security Council that supported the text setting a 12-month deadline for negotiations on a final peace deal with Israel and an imposed full Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and east Jerusalem by the end of 2017. East Jerusalem was to become the Palestinian capital, and security arrangements were to include "a third-party presence."

Argentina, Chad, Chile, Jordan and Luxembourg also voted for the resolution. Australia and the United States voted against. The United Kingdom, Lithuania, South Korea and Rwanda abstained.

Until shortly before the vote, Security Council diplomats had expected the resolution to pass, prompting a U.S. veto. But Nigeria, which had been expected to vote "yes," abstained at the last minute.

Nigeria's ambassador, U. Joy Ogwu, said the ultimate path to peace lies "in a negotiated solution."

Israel called PA conduct at the United Nations a "march of folly" and its effort to win UN support for a peace deal within a year a "provocation."

In Washington, meanwhile, political leaders were considering steps to defund the PA, which receives $400 million a year from U.S. taxpayers.

Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen called on the Obama administration "to show Abu Mazen (Abbas) and the PA that there will be consequences for their irresponsible behaviour and continued efforts to undermine the peace process.

"Congress must do everything in its power to block funds to the PA and to any UN entity that recognizes a non-existent State of Palestine to make it clear to [Abbas] that there will be consequences to his schemes at the United Nations and other international organizations like the International Criminal Court," she stated.

Aaron David Miller, a former presidential advisor and a distinguished scholar at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, said PA funding will be increasingly at risk in the Republican-controlled Congress that will be sworn in later this month.

"I think the odds of defunding are higher than they ever were before," he said. "A whole new reality has been created, and I suspect that they are going to close any loopholes that may exist regarding the funding. The world in Washington is about to change."

The State Department did not respond to inquiries as to whether it believes Abbas' reported move would trigger defunding.

Jeff Rathke, director of the department's Office of Press Relations, spared few words in condemning Abbas' application to the ICC. He described the move as "an escalatory step that will not achieve any of the outcomes most Palestinians have long hoped to see for their people," and as a "counterproductive" action that "does nothing to further the aspirations of the Palestinian people for a sovereign and independent state."

Earlier, U.S. Ambassador Samantha Power said: "We voted against this resolution [on statehood] because... peace must come from hard compromises that occur at the negotiating table."

The resolution was "deeply unbalanced" and didn't take into account Israel's security concerns. "This text addresses the concerns of just one side," Power said.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a statement that the PA was "seeking to impose on us a diktat that would undermine Israel's security, put its future in peril. Israel will oppose conditions that endanger our future."

Referring to the ICC application, Netanyahu said, "The one who needs to fear the ICC is the Palestinian Authority, which has a unity government with Hamas, a terror organization like [ISIS], which commits war crimes."

Netanyahu called Israel's soldiers "the most moral army in the world" and said the country would take unspecified "retaliatory steps." ■

OPINION

Israeli election is a referendum on Netanyahu

Gerald Steinberg

Israel is often called a hyper-democracy, and the description is well deserved. Two years after the last election, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's coalition suddenly collapsed. We're going to the polls again on March 17, and Israelis have been quickly bombarded by a whirlwind of new alliances, parties, candidates, speeches, jingles and slogans – all promising to solve our problems and improve our lives.

The main battle is for prime minister, where Netanyahu faces some surprisingly serious competition. Although he generally received high marks for his handling of the recent war with Hamas, his poll results have declined steadily ever since. This can largely be attributed to a failure to solve economic problems, particularly the huge gap between highly compensated managers and the poorly paid rank-and-file, and the shortage of affordable housing in the cities. Various policy responses have moved slowly through the machinery of government, and to most Israelis, it appears that despite all the talk of reform, nothing significant is changing.

Indeed, on a wide range of issues, the coalition was dysfunctional, and when Netanyahu announced the decision to go to the polls, he referred repeatedly to a "crisis of governance," which he blamed on his partners – specifically Justice Minister Tzipi Livni and Finance Minister Yair Lapid, who both head their own parties. Left unsaid but casting a major shadow was the disruptive influence of two other party leaders in the coalition – Avigdor Liberman and Naftali Bennett – who often attacked Netanyahu from the right.

The final straw was a proposal to strengthen Israel's legal status as a Jewish state, which engendered intense opposition from the left, and from critics abroad with a highly simplistic view of complex issues. Given all of Israel's challenges, this one could have been put off until a consensus had been formed. Instead, Netanyahu pushed the process in a clumsy manner, leading government ministers and the media to focus for weeks on this ideological topic.

Netanyahu's leadership skills have also been questioned by Israelis in relation to the ongoing conflict with the United States, which makes many people nervous. Although many assign considerable blame to U.S. President Barack Obama, Secretary of State John Kerry and problematic advisers such as Martin Indyk, there's a sense the government should have been less confrontational and more proactive in introducing and exploring peace plans.

For these reasons and a wider sense that Netanyahu is exhausted after six years managing Israel's crises and complexities, the upcoming election is likely to focus more on leadership than policy. Highlighting this, Labor party head Isaac Herzog forged an alliance with Livni as an alternative to Netanyahu. In parallel, Liberman and Bennett are also being presented as potential national leaders.

Thus, the election can be viewed as a referendum on Netanyahu rather than a choice between different ideologies and policy prescriptions for Israel's challenges, both domestically and internationally. And it's far too early to count Netanyahu out. On the contrary, he's still considered to be the best available leader, particularly given his experience responding to threats to Israel's vital interests.

And even if Netanyahu were to be defeated, the commentators who expect this to bring about major changes in talks with the Palestinians are likely to be disappointed. Polls and other indicators show most Israelis would welcome a stable peace agreement, but don't believe Palestinian leaders will make the necessary compromises. The perception is that the goal of destroying Israel remains central and talk of a two-state solution is a façade. Given this reality, no government is likely to take the risks demanded by the Palestinians and supported by America and Europe.

Instead, the next government, whether led by Netanyahu or someone else, is likely to start by focusing on critical economic issues, where there's a consensus on what needs to be done. In Israel, as in other democracies, leaders set directions and formulate policies, but they can only be successful if they're backed by the public. ■

Israel wants U.S. to stop funding PA

REBECCA SHIMONI STOIL AND TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Israel wants the U.S. Congress to stop funding the Palestinian Authority and the Israeli government froze 500 million shekels ($127 million US) in Palestinian tax revenues collected on Ramallah's behalf, all in response to the Palestinian Authority filing a request to join the International Criminal Court last week.

An Israeli official said Sunday that Jerusalem will turn to pro-Israel Congress members to ensure that a law banning funds to the Palestinian Authority be enforced if it should turn to the ICC, Ha'aretz reported. The Palestinians stand to lose some $400 million in annual U.S. aid.

The stop-gap funding bill passed by Congress and signed by President Barack Obama last month contains language that stipulates that no State Department economic support funding may be given to the PA if "the Palestinians initiate an International Criminal Court judicially authorized investigation, or actively support such an investigation, that subjects Israeli nationals to an investigation for alleged crimes against Palestinians."

Earlier Sunday, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu threatened a strong response to the Palestinian application to join the ICC, saying the move represented the opening salvo of a further confrontation with Israel.

Speaking to his cabinet hours after Israel announced financial sanctions in response to the Palestinian move, Netanyahu vowed Israel would take action and not let IDF soldiers be prosecuted abroad.

"The Palestinian Authority has chosen confrontation with Israel and we will not sit idly by," Netanyahu said at his office in Jerusalem. "We will not allow IDF soldiers and commanders to be hauled before the International Criminal Court in the Hague."

The Palestinians' ICC manoeuvre may tip the scales in Washington, where there is already bipartisan frustration with PA President Mahmoud Abbas' decision to put a Palestinian statehood resolution before the United Nations Security Council last week, and, after the resolution was defeated, to sign on to the ICC the next day.

Even if Abbas' ICC gambit does not play out – and the Palestinians' route ahead at the ICC is strewn with legal obstacles – it's viewed by many leaders of the incoming Republican-controlled Congress as the latest justification to re-examine the PA's American funding.

Members of Congress on both sides of the aisle have had staffers looking into whether there is any legal basis for penalizing the United Nations and its affiliated institutions, as well as the Palestinian Authority itself, for either the ICC move or the failed UN Security Council resolution. Those checks seemed to come up largely empty-handed, but the PA move to initiate war crimes investigations against Israel may catalyse further efforts.

Since the formation of the Fatah-and Hamas-backed Palestinian national unity government last spring, calls in Congress to defund the PA have become increasingly common.

In recent months, even before the November congressional elections, Republican and Democrat members of Congress called repeatedly for a re-examination – or even freeze – of funding to the Palestinian Authority.

Washington is a key PA funder and budgetary legislation traditionally places a series of conditions on the continuation of funding.

The "continuing resolution" passed in December by Congress in lieu of a budget repeats prior year language that no economic assistance may be provided to the PA if the Palestinians obtain the same standing as member states or full membership as a state in the United Nations or any specialized agency.

If the Palestinians obtain member state status at the UN or any specialized agency, the legislation stipulates the PLO office in Washington will be closed for at least three months. The office can be re-opened after those three months, provided the Palestinians engage in direct and meaningful talks with Israel.

The ICC is not a UN specialized agency and the ICC-related language is contained in a separate clause. Unlike other defunding provisions included in the funding bill, the ICC clause does not include a waiver by which defunding can be avoided due to American national security interests. ■

Allegations are 'completely false,' Dershowitz claims

JTA
WASHINGTON

Alan Dershowitz firmly denied allegations that he engaged in sexual activity with a minor employed by a client.

Dershowitz, a Harvard law professor emeritus, declared "totally, unequivocally and completely false" allegations that he had sex with the former staffer for investor Jeffrey Epstein.

Dershowitz was named in a lawsuit charging that federal prosecutors in Florida broke the law by granting Epstein a plea deal to avoid a federal prosecution, Politico reported Dec. 31.

According to a court filing quoted by Politico, Epstein forced the woman, referred to as Jane Doe #3, to have sex with Dershowitz, among other men.

"Epstein required Jane Doe #3 to have sexual relations with Dershowitz on numerous occasions while she was a minor, not only in Florida but also on private planes, in New York, New Mexico and the U.S. Virgin Islands," the filing claimed.

Dershowitz, who helped defend Epstein against prostitution charges, told Politico that he was not in any of the places at the times cited in the filing, save for one occasion when he visited Epstein's private island with his family.

Dershowitz told Politico he planned to seek the disbarment of the two lawyers representing the former staffer.

"I'm planning to file disbarment charges against the two lawyers who signed this petition without even checking the manifests of airplanes or travel itineraries, et cetera," he said.

As a result of the plea deal, Epstein served 13 months for state prostitution charges but avoided a federal prosecution. ■

Playwright aims to start talk about medical ethics and compassion

KATHRYN KATES

Waiting Room is the latest theatrical offering by playwright, author and actor Diane Flacks. The powerful drama examines medical diagnosis, prognosis and uncertainty, and runs from Jan. 14 to Feb. 15 at Tarragon Theatre's Mainspace.

For Flacks it's a personal story, although not autobiographical. Her youngest son, Jonny, now eight, spent much of his life at The Hospital for Sick Children until he was four.

"It is a rare club that you end up belonging to if you are a hospital veteran," says Flacks, who along with her spouse, Janis Purdy, also has a son Eli, 12.

"By being in that place and meeting the people we met, I felt like I had a lot of stories to tell and a lot of experience balancing on a precipice of life and death. I had luckily never experienced this until that point."

She says many people who go through something difficult go to therapy, whereas artistic people end up acting, writing or creating something.

"What the patient in this story has is not remotely connected to what Jonny had as a condition, but I was really fascinated with the struggle that a couple goes through in a hospital," she says.

"I was also, at the same time, reading a lot about brain science, so that's why I focused the story on a doctor and on the brain, and the irony that a doctor who treats people with brain conditions develops a brain disease. I thought that would be an interesting dramatic struggle to put him in and to put his patients in."

Flacks approached Tarragon's artistic director, Richard Rose, with her idea about the collision of human beings with medical realities, as well as the medical system and its relevance to all of us. Rose commissioned her to write it.

Flacks, who has written or co-written a dozen plays to date, teamed up with director Richard Greenblatt on Waiting Room. The two have worked on seven projects before as either co-actors or co-writers. This is their second time as writer and director. "I am really grateful to Richard because he is so respectful of the writing process and has so much to offer."

She hopes Waiting Room will start conversations about end-of-life care and what we expect from our doctors and nurses. She also hopes that audiences will ask and wonder about medical compassion and ethics and how they would cope.

The cast of Waiting Room includes Ari Cohen, Michelle Monteith, Jordan Pettle, Warona Setshwaelo, Jane Spidell and Jenny Young. Flacks says she is in awe of these actors and their commitment to the play.

She decided not to perform in the play herself. "Sometimes if you know you are going to play a character, you kind of write that for you. I wanted to write characters that would be challenging and, in my mind, beyond what my capacities are as an actress, so that it would be really challenging for anyone.

"From my perspective, I wanted to be on the outside and be able to see problems, as it is my responsibility as a writer to take that job on directly and fix them."

Flacks says being Jewish influences every part of her art. She went to the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and says the kind of rigorous academics that were required there are part of everything she does today.

Her past credits include critically acclaimed solo shows Myth Me, By a Thread, Random Acts and Bear With Me. She has written and performed in theatres in Canada and the United States. She has also written for and appeared on numerous Canadian TV series including The Kids in the Hall, for which she was nominated for a writing Emmy.

She is Nightwood Theatre's 2014 playwright-in-residence and is working on a new play about women and religion called Unholy. Currently, she can be heard as CBC Radio's national parenting columnist. Her book Bear With Me: What They Don't Tell You About Pregnancy and New Motherhood was published by McClelland & Stewart. On the acting front, she is working with Katie Ford on a theatre piece called Bits and Pieces, which she will perform this spring. ■

An unremarkable life filled with unusual events

jserge@thecjn.ca

It's a shame that in the preface to Coming Ashore, author Catherine Gildiner tells the reader that this, the third volume of her memoirs, will be her last.

As you finish the book, you want to shout back, "Just when it was getting interesting!"

This, actually, would be unfair. It was interesting from the get-go, which is why saying goodbye to the sassy, sharp-tongued Cathy McClure is so difficult.

It's hard to explain the allure of McClure, now Gildiner. Why would the first 20-some years in the life of a successful but otherwise unremarkable Toronto psychologist warrant three books? And more importantly why would they be critically acclaimed bestsellers?

The best answer is that Gildiner is an artful storyteller. It's not that her childhood and youth were especially noteworthy, but she did have interesting experiences, and it's these episodes that she cultivates to the fullest.

For instance, in her first book, Too Close to the Falls, which focuses on her childhood years, she mentions coming across a half-naked Marilyn Monroe while delivering pharmaceuticals from her father's shop in New York State

In Coming Ashore, which picks up her memoirs from the age of 20 or so in the late 1960s, she comes across a youthful Bill Clinton and hippie-icon Jimi Hendrix.

Coming Ashore starts at Oxford University, the prestigious English school she attends on a scholarship just after the events of the second book, After the Falls, which focuses on her turbulent teenage years.

One evening, with her college dorm mates (all men except for another American expat, Margaret-Ann), she decides to take a trip to London, which in the late '60s, was rivalled only by San Francisco for its hip, counter-culture lifestyle.

At a small club to see Eric Burdon and the Animals, they happen to see "a thin black man in a large black felt hat with a feather in it" jump onstage holding a guitar and playing Foxy Lady. That man is Jimi Hendrix, who while huge in America, is only just making it big in England.

It doesn't end there. Several months later, her roommate Margaret-Ann, a somewhat pious, and overbearing young woman, confesses to her that she has cancer, and wants Cathy's help in losing her virginity before she dies. And she wants it to be with Jimi Hendrix.

The amazing thing is, after finding out his routine after gigs, they are able to pull the feat off. (OK, knowing the Hendrix legend, maybe it's not so amazing, after all!)

One day, Cathy gets talked into participating in one of the riverboat races that elite English colleges are particularly renowned for.

At one point in the race, Cathy's boat gets "bumped," and they have to pull aside and let the other boat behind them pass. But a man watching "with curly hair and a scraggly beard" who's just a few feet away on the bank cups his hands and yells in a southern American drawl, "There are no officials here, keep going."

She meets with and talks to this young American "with the Allen Ginsberg beard" after the race. She later learns he is at another college and is planning a big anti-Vietnam war rally. His name is Bill Clinton.

Gildiner has a wicked sense of humour at times, but she can also be a bit preachy.

Several times, she gets into discussions with her upper-class English dorm mates about the "stultifying" class system, and you feel like yelling, "Oy, she's such an annoying American."

This oppressive class structure is one of the reasons she leaves Oxford, and soon, after a brief tenure as a teacher at an inner city school in Cleveland, she winds up doing a PhD on Samuel Coleridge at the University of Toronto.

After a short spell at Rochdale College, Toronto's notorious downtown student co-op, she meets Michael, and leaves Rochdale to move in with him.

One day, he drives her to his parents' apartment at Bathurst and Wilson in Toronto. It's the first time in her life she is in a Jewish neighbourhood. "Nearly all the men we passed were wearing small skullcaps with bobby pins holding them on... Then we passed men who looked like they were extras in Fiddler on the Roof... These men had long curls on the sides of their faces as though they had set one piece of hair in a pin curl and it had unfurled."

Coming Ashore
By Catherine Gildiner
ECW Press

As she makes disparaging remarks abut the men and the women in wigs, Michael finally tells her that his parents are from Poland and lived though the war. "We lived with my grandparents, who looked exactly like these people."

Cathy, a Catholic girl from New York State, is confused. It's then she realizes that her Jewish girlfriends growing up in suburban America were different from these first-generation immigrants, descendants of Holocaust survivors from eastern Europe. Her Jewish friends had Christmas trees, she tells him.

"I would never have a Christmas tree," he tells her.

Things don't go so well at his parents' home either. Later, she hears Michael's friend tell him that his mother is "sitting shivah now that you're dating a shiksa." Looking up the words in a Yiddish dictionary, she understands that essentially Michael's friend has told him, "You are going out with a detested thing, and your mother will mourn your death."

Of interest to us is that shortly after this, she gets invited to his aunt's for Passover. "No one else was there," Gildiner writes, "except for one couple sitting in the corner of this cavernous room. The man was reading The Canadian Jewish News, and the woman was sitting primly, clutching her purse on her lap."

Alas, out of respect for the privacy of those still living, she decided to end her memoirs at that stage. So we'll never read about her conversion to Judaism and marriage to Michael Gildiner.

Which is unfortunate, because no doubt Gildiner would have spun a wonderful tale about it – and who knows who she would have run into at her wedding? ■

KOFFLER HOSTS EVENING WITH MAUS CARTOONIST ART SPIEGELMAN

Art Spiegelman, the legendary American artist-illustrator who won the Pulitzer Prize for his Holocaust-themed comic book Maus, is speaking on "What the %@&*! Happened to Comics?" His talk provides a chronological tour of the evolution of comics. The man who "almost singlehandedly brought comics out of the toy closet and onto the bookshelves" asserts that "comics echo the way the brain works" because people think in iconographic images and bursts of language, not paragraphs of text.

The creator of both Maus and Maus II, Spiegelman appears at the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema, 406 Bloor St. W. General admission $39, students $29. Monday, Jan. 26, 7 p.m. koffler arts.org. His visit coincides with CO-MIX, a retrospective of Spiegelman's work currently on view at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

THE CANADIAN JEWISH NEWS CJN

We invite readers to submit unpublished, original short stories or poetry that explore Jewish themes.

They should not exceed 2,000 words. Selected submissions will appear in the Passover Supplement of The CJN on April 2, 2015. Not all submissions can be published, and not all those selected will appear in both Toronto and Montreal editions. We look for originality. Please don't send more than three entries. We cannot correspond with submitters.

Deadline for submissions is Feb. 27, 2015 at 3 p.m.

E-mail submissions to:

We can only accept email submissions. We prefer Word documents.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Hunan, China renowned for its natural beauty

BARBARA KINGSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In China's province of Hunan, food consumption is akin to flame eating, especially for those of us who didn't grow up with peppers in our mouths. But in this part of China, that extra-spicy food is considered more delicious than the food of other Chinese provinces. Since the chefs are keen to please foreigners, it is usual for them to ask if you want to lessen the bite of this fiery food, but still keep the taste.

Renowned for natural beauty that can't be duplicated anywhere else in the world, Hunan province, located in the south-central part of mainland China, has mountains on the east, west and south and the Yangtze River in the north. With a population of just over 65 million, its written history goes back to 350 BCE. Changsha, the capital, reputed to be well over 400 years old, is a sophisticated, busy city.

However, if you mention Hongjiang on the Yuan River, the reaction is somewhat dubious and gets the curiosity of all tourists. It was known decades ago for the plethora of brothels and opium dens where sailors and businessmen happened to pass through because of its busy port. Now, there are tours through the houses of ill repute, which show some vestige of that past. The small city is cleaned up, even somewhat classy, and has become a tourist stop with a view of the former lifestyle. There are also some musical performances presented for visitors.

Each destination holds a different surprise. The ancient city of Phoenix, known in Chinese as Fenghuang, meaning longevity and good omens, is my favourite, and like a gift, is filled with unimaginable beauty. Think green, since the mountains and fields are as green as possible. The Tuo Jiang River reflects the colour, and this, in combination with the blue skies, makes it seem like a fine painting. The city was once a thriving centre of Miao culture.

Today, the Miao are a minority, whom the People's Republic of China accept, and they have settled here. They can't be missed with their traditional colourful clothing.

The old city of Phoenix is like a small town that has not been modernized, with houses that sit on stilts overlooking the river. The worn cobblestone streets have few cars, and the wider streets lead to small lanes. Early morning is the time the locals do their shopping to avoid the crush of visitors. The larger streets with their terrific shops and very well made and often trendy one-of-a-kind designs, are full by midday. It's also a friendly place, as the locals wave and greet foreigners from their windows and balconies in the old buildings.

Zhangjiajie National Forest is the main attraction of this province. It has about 3,000 sculptural rocks that rise into the sky, each different but equally splendid. The tallest, Tianzi Mountain, is 4,140 feet. Little wonder that this is called the "Monarch of the Peak Valley."

The unique area is so picturesque that it's difficult to believe that nature, not a sculptor, can take credit for the beauty. Looking up, I can't see the tops, since there's a haze covering the high peaks. This wondrous site is even more exciting when the sun starts to lower and casts a golden hue on the many truly awesome huge sandstone pillars. This is nature at its best, and it would be difficult to find this extraordinary sight anywhere else.

The good news is that there are cable cars to take you to the top, where you can get a close look at this special view. To come down, as with almost every site in China, there is always a long queue, but it is so speedy it take only a few minutes before you're quickly ushered off.

Perhaps the one eyesore here is the large building that's now a Chinese favourite, McDonald's. Some condiments are Asian, but this McDonald's menu could have been anywhere in the world. It has become a favourite, and is much enjoyed by the Chinese, even though it was once considered an expensive treat.

Cable car to the top of the mountain (top). The river in Phoenix with traditional houses on stilts

Our guide said when he was young, the special gift on his birthday was going to McDonald's. But now with the great economy, its pricing fits well into the usual cost of a good Chinese meal. Just guessing by the throngs of people inside, at the table outside, and those sitting on the steps, it is probably the busiest McDonald's in the world. The nation has taken to burgers and chips. I, on the other hand, looked forward to the great Chinese offerings. So what if my mouth burned for a short time? It was delicious. I realize, in retrospect, that I didn't have one bad meal, and I think the choices of fine restaurants are due to the efficient Chinese tourism office in Toronto, our hosts.

The main problem with the location of this McDonald's is that although there are sinks for hand washing, if you are in need of a bathroom, you have to "take 20 steps down (more like 30), walk several metres (I'd say at least 50), then turn left, then at a lane turn right." For such a large establishment, it wouldn't occur to any western eatery not to have bathrooms on the premises.

And tourists should know that most of the facilities are only squatting stalls, so it's necessary to take tissues and do some squatting exercise before heading here.

Everything in China is huge. I would cast my vote and say the largest stone monument of Mao Zedong is at Orange Island Park. It's mega-mammoth and set among artfully planted colourful flowers overlooking a small lake. And why Orange Island? Apparently, there is a bounty of oranges and clementines on the trees here. Happily, we were able to see much of the lovely park with what we would call a golf cart.

I wasn't expecting Shangong to be so sophisticated and a top university city with an ancient history. More than 40,000 students attend the university, which dates back to 950 CE. Some of the buildings have been renovated, while others were recently built but have been kept to the original style. The faculties include medicine, law and social history, and many other disciplines offered in any fine university. The only drawback for tourists is the overpriced gift shop, which does have wonderful original but pricey paintings. I would have loved to have one of the modern canvases.

And finally, history buffs take notice. Although Zhijang is in nearby Hubei province, it isn't a tourist destination. It's a historic military site where the formal surrender of Japan to China took place after World War II.

So see Beijing, go to Singapore, but don't miss the intriguing province of Hunan. ■

WRY BREAD

Chanukah the whole year through

David Levine

With the New Year upon us, most of us have put away our Chanukah decorations – and with them, the spirit of the holiday season – not to return until next November, when the radio starts to warn us not to shout, cry or pout.

But Chanukah is more than just a holiday – for one man, the lessons of Chanukah last the whole year. Meet Judah McCabe.

"The Maccabee victory over Hellenism is the most important spiritual moment of the Jewish calendar," says McCabe. "And that's my mission – shining a light to vanquish the darkness the whole year round."

Hellenism – the spread of Greek culture that places value on personal comfort, and luxurious housing, clothing or food – was soundly defeated by the Maccabees approximately 2,100 years ago and has yet to reappear in the Jewish community.

McCabe (born Judah Melmstein) says he was inspired by "the true message of the Maccabees" – community, devotion, and fuel scarcity – to change his name and devote his life to keeping his community free of Hellenistic influence.

In accordance with what he calls "Maccabean principles," McCabe lives in a single, windowless room beneath a 24-hour CHEEP-O™ convenience store (where he refuses to shop, citing "the obscenity of convenience"). His meagre kitchen contains only bread, salt and a grapefruit-sized wad of dried mud ("in case I start to enjoy the bread too much," he explains).

"Comfort is decadent and, therefore, a sin," says McCabe. "That fact changed my life and allowed me to really connect with the Maccabee spirit."

Each day, McCabe strives to enact his principals through good deeds in his community. "People love to talk about their community work," McCabe told me, "but a Maccabee doesn't talk. He acts."

After much convincing, McCabe allowed me to tag along as he spent an afternoon shining the light of Chanukah.

Our afternoon began with a walking tour of several upscale restaurants, where McCabe politely but firmly reminded patrons of the evils of material indulgence and the fate of the Hellenists in Jerusalem. "I think they heard me out," McCabe told me afterward, "especially when I threatened their families. Who knows? Maybe this will motivate them to do tshuvah."

Next, I follow McCabe to a local shopping mall, to continue his one-on-one youth counselling project.

"It's simple," says McCabe, crouching down outside an entrance. "This place is a temple to Hellenism. Anyone walking out with a bag is a Hellenist, so I make sure they know they're unwanted in this town unless they renounce their ways."

Finally, we proceeded to the Jewish community centre parking lot, where McCabe spent several hours keying cars, occasionally stopping to slash the more expensive tires.

"These heretics worship gods of chrome and leather," mused McCabe, as he finished carving the word "sinner" across the hood of a Lincoln Navigator while humming Dreidl Dreidl Dreidl. "The pursuit of resale value is vanity. Trust in public transit and you will find redemption."

Community response to McCabe's campaign of purification has been mixed. Many community leaders were glad to have a "spokesperson" who would "stand up for the neighbourhood," while others were concerned about zealots in their community.

McCabe is quick to correct the doubters. "Judah McCabe is not a zealot," he says, suddenly in the third person, "Judah McCabe is a regular person who acts zealously. It's not the same thing at all!"

And, just like Santa's endless joy, Judah's zeal isn't just a seasonal affair.

"My message applies to every day of the calendar: you, too, can be a Maccabee! Bring Chanukah to life the whole year round! Reject materialism and luxury or face the military consequences that your neighbours think you deserve." ■

Aaron Katchen

And Pharaoh commanded all his people, saying, "Every son who is born you shall cast into the Nile." (Exodus 1:22).

I had a Torah teacher who compared many stories in Torah to a Chekhov play – you don't bring out the gun in the first act unless it comes back in the third. That same teacher also reminded us that we must leave space for every question the Torah raises and not rush to answer or justify the solution.

I raise these two points because as a campus rabbi, I encourage students to ask questions, to struggle with the text and develop a personal relationship with their history and story. Students often present me with challenges regarding troubling texts. I do my best to honour and hear their questions. Often the questions are better than the answers I can provide. Many times a resolution is achieved by revisiting the context of the verses.

Students have often raised questions regarding the plague of the firstborn (Exodus 12:29).

The Talmud (Sotah 12b) comments on the introductory verse (Ex. 1:22) by stating: "And Pharaoh commanded all his people." Rabbi Yossi son of Rabbi Hanina said that he caused the same decree upon his own people. Rabbi Yossi also said that Pharoah made three decrees: first, "If it be a son, you shall kill him," then "every son that is born you shall cast into the river." Finally, he caused the same decree upon his own people.

The Talmud reminds us that the plague of the firstborn was not arbitrary, but rather put into motion by Pharaoh. Our verse is the first act, where Pharaoh brings out the gun by decreeing that all Jewish baby boys must be killed. The consequence of that action, in the third act, is the plague. This coupling shows that all actions have consequences. ■

There is a scene in the 1984 film Moscow on the Hudson where Robin Williams, playing a Russian musician who, having defected to America, finds himself overwhelmed by the selection of coffee available at the supermarket. All he can do is stand there and joyfully repeat the word "coffee."

We associate freedom with choice: the lack of constraint facilitates accessibility, be it the availability of more consumer products or the liberty to act in different ways.

Though slavery is the ultimate constraint, Shmot shows us that choice exists, even in extreme conditions. One powerful example is provided by the midwives, who are ordered by Pharaoh to kill the Israelites' baby boys. "The midwives, fearing God, did not do as the king of Egypt had told them – they let the boys live." (Shmot 1:17) The Hebrew verb vatechayena is understood by both Rashi and Ibn Ezra to mean "they made the boys live." The midwives went out of their way to ensure these babies' survival. Rashi explains that Shifra and Puah provided food, while Ibn Ezra states that they did whatever was necessary to keep the boys alive.

A second example is that of the unnamed man whom tradition understands to be Amram, Moses' father. "A certain man of the house of Levi went and married a Levite woman." (2:1) Ramban, focusing on the verb "went," sees the man's action as a deliberate one: he consciously ignores the danger inherent in Pharaoh's decree.

Victor Frankl wrote in Man's Search for Meaning that "everything can be taken from a man but one thing: the last of the human freedoms – to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way." Our ancestors' choices were "the cry of the Israelites" (Shmot 3:9) that drew God's attention, ultimately resulting in redemption. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and the rabbi at Or Hadash Synagogue, Newmarket, Ont.

One of the earliest examples of anti-Semitism appears with Pharaoh and his followers. In this parshah, one sees aggression against the children of Israel. It's hard to believe that this new Pharaoh did not know the righteous acts of Joseph, but Pharaoh links the growth of the Israelite people to their becoming a threat.

This ideological propaganda leads to acts of physical torment as Pharaoh sets taskmasters over our ancestors and imposes forced harsh labour. Enslavement and oppression continue for a couple of hundred years.

The seeds of contemporary anti-Semitism sown from our earliest days have continued to the horrific murders of four rabbis and a Druze officer Nov. 18 in Jerusalem.

Every chapter of hatred against the Jewish People has been predicated on physical violence and ideological propaganda. In Parshat Shmot, Pharaoh successfully uses twisted language to inspire genocide against Israel.

We continue to mourn the losses of four Jews, all of them rabbis, who were davening the Amidah when they were brutally slain, garbed in tallit and tfillin.

Prior to the Exodus, we learn the origins of tfillin. We bind them on our hand and over our eyes to remind us that we serve God with our actions and beliefs. The physical and the ideological must be true and honest.

A few weeks ago, we witnessed not only the physical act of terror but also the verbal. Jew haters everywhere spread vicious lies, but so does media propaganda in North America. A Canadian periodical reported the events of Nov. 18 as follows: "Israeli police kill two Arabs after apparent synagogue attack." Notice how the language turns the victim into the aggressor and the aggressor into the victim.

Parshat Shmot reminds us to be vigilant against physical and verbal terror. I will always remember what took place Nov. 18 when I don my tallit and tfillin. ■

Some tips for a perfect pasta meal

SUE EPSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

To some, cooking pasta is the easiest thing in the world to cook. To others it's a culinary disaster... overcooked, undercooked, tasteless, stuck together mush.

It needn't be that way. First of all, most of cooking is just being there. That is, letting the telephone ring through to voice mail and simply keeping your focus on the task at hand. And by being there –that is, tending the pasta – you'll be able to do the only test available to judge its doneness: taste it.

This tip alone will improve your pasta-cooking skills, but the following steps will guarantee a perfect dish of pasta every time.

• Use a pot that's large enough to accommodate the pasta without crowding. For one pound of pasta, an eight-quart pot is good; a 10-quart pot is better. Pasta needs room to move freely as it cooks. At a minimum, use nothing smaller than a six-quart pot.

• Use plenty of water. For one pound of pasta, you should use at least six quarts of water.

• Add salt to the water – about 1 tablespoon per gallon. Salt adds flavour to the pasta, which helps create a well-seasoned dish. Often, a perfectly seasoned sauce will still taste like it needs "something" because the pasta is unseasoned.

• Bring the water to a full, rolling boil before adding the pasta. One of the prime causes for pasta sticking together is that the water had not yet come to a full boil. When you add pasta to water that has not yet reached the boiling point, it releases natural starches, which act like glue. Since the pasta is simply sitting in the water at the time, the strands stick together.

• Bring the water back to the boil as quickly as possible after adding the pasta. In the case of pasta strands, like spaghetti or linguine, stir the pasta until it has wilted and become submerged in the cooking water, then cover the pot until the water returns to the boil. When the water has boiled, though, uncover the pot, and finish cooking uncovered.

• Stir the pasta two or three times throughout the cooking process. Pasta cooks in eight to ten minutes. The brief time you spend attending to it will reap huge rewards at the dinner table.

• Never add olive oil or any other oil to the pasta cooking water. The oil coats the pasta, and prevents the sauce from adhering to it when you've put the entire dish together.

• Cook the pasta to the 'al dente' state. The only way to judge this is by tasting. Manufacturer's cooking times are just guidelines. Begin tasting the pasta about two minutes before the manufacturer says it should be done. Also, there will be a small amount of carryover cooking between the time you remove the pasta from the stove, drain in the sink, and combine with the sauce.

• Never rinse pasta. When you rinse pasta, you're washing away most of the starches and nutrients that you were seeking to enjoy in the first place.

So be there. Be attentive. Taste, and learn when pasta has cooked to the consistency that you like. Follow these 10 little steps, and you'll develop a reputation as a miracle worker with pasta. And with the myriad of sauces available, you will have expanded your cooking repertoire immeasurably.

Baked Lemon Spaghetti

- ❑ 1 (8 oz.) package spaghetti
- ❑ 1/3 cup unsalted butter
- ❑ 1 (8 oz.) carton sour cream
- ❑ 1 tsp. finely grated lemon peel
- ❑ 3 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
- ❑ 3 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
- ❑ 1/4 cup grated Parmesan cheese
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste

Cook spaghetti according to package directions until al dente. Drain and place spaghetti in a greased 1.5-quart casserole dish. Melt butter in medium saucepan over low heat. Remove from heat, and stir in sour cream, lemon peel, and lemon juice. Mix until smooth. Pour mixture over spaghetti in casserole dish.

Mix well bake in a preheated 400-degree oven for 15 to 20 minutes, or until heated through. Remove from oven, and add grated parmesan cheese and parsley. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Serve immediately. (Makes 8 servings)

Greenspan was a role model for young lawyers

Greenspan put his powers of persuasion to use as a vocal opponent of the death penalty. In 1986, when there was talk of making it a free vote in parliament, he put his practice on hold for several months and travelled the country to lobby against it.

"As a lawyer and a citizen, I can't thank him enough," said Adler. "People don't realize how hit and miss court can be... I believe Eddie played a huge role in making sure it was defeated."

In recent years, Greenspan became more and more concerned about the rise of anti-Semitism in polite society, Jonas said. "He took it seriously when it was embraced by well-educated, accomplished, successful people."

"Over the past two years, Eddie became a beacon of strength for Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center," said Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the centre. "He readily agreed to speak at our conference on anti-Semitism in June, and most recently, he co-chaired our State of the Union luncheon.

"In fact," Benlolo said, "we had a wonderful lunch meeting just a few weeks ago where Eddie was deeply concerned for the rising tide of anti-Semitism, particularly on campuses. We developed a specific course of action that he planned on addressing over the winter break. He had so much more to give in this regard and his loss for our community is profound."

Greenspan grew up in Niagara Falls. Last July, he and his brother, Brian, returned to their hometown to be presented with the keys to the city by Mayor Jim Diodati.

The Niagara Falls Review, citing his teachers, said Greenspan was known to be bright, but they complained he wasn't taking their classes seriously. He was known, however, for his skill in public speaking.

His father, Joe, was a scrap metal dealer who aspired to be a lawyer, but was forced by circumstances to give it up to pursue the family business.

Although their father could not pursue his ambition, Eddie and Brian became prominent lawyers, as did Eddie's daughter, Julianna. His sister, Rosann, serves as executive director of the Center for the Study of Law and Society at University of California at Berkeley.

"All his life, his father groomed his children, especially Eddie, his eldest son, to fulfil the dream he had to be a litigator, and Eddie happily fulfilled his father's dream," Jonas said.

He also served as a role model for a generation of lawyers inspired by his work and his ability to steer public policy by his advocacy against capital punishment, Brodsky said.

"We saw it could happen. We saw how one person could make a difference. It was tremendously inspiring," Brodsky added. ■

Laszlo Mezei: Depicting the desolation of Auschwitz

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca

To mark the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts (MMFA) is presenting the educational exhibition Anne Frank – A History for Today from Jan. 8 to 28. Organized by Anne Frank House in Amsterdam, this exhibition has been shown in more than 60 countries around the world.

Concurrently, a dozen haunting black and white photographs of the Auschwitz-Birkenau site taken last year by renowned Hungarian-born Montreal photographer Laszlo Mezei are also on view.

The subject is in stark contrast to the portraits of important people and celebrities Laszlo – as he is known professionally – has taken over the decades. They have included hundreds of titans of industry, from Conrad Black to Paul Desmarais Sr., and politicians from Pierre Elliott Trudeau to David Ben-Gurion, as well as personalities in the arts, sports and entertainment worlds. Oprah Winfrey sat for him, as did Canada's most renowned portraitist Yousuf Karsh.

But the Auschwitz project has deep personal meaning for Laszlo, who immigrated to Montreal in 1956. The Holocaust scarred his family, as it did hundreds of thousands of others in Hungary, and had a profound effect on his early life.

Laszlo Mezei

You are internationally renowned for your stunning portraits of the rich, the famous and the powerful. Why did you decide to turn your lens on Auschwitz, the very antithesis of the beauty and vitality you normally capture?

I had been thinking for years about doing a photo essay at Auschwitz in memory of those who perished there. After a lifelong career of, as you say, producing portraits of beauty and vitality, I went because I wanted to contribute, in my own way, to the important and endless fight against forgetfulness. It's a fight not just against forgetfulness, but against the deniers – those who insist the Holocaust never happened and whose fondest wish really is to bring about a second Holocaust. The world can build museum after museum, and construct memorial after memorial, but the deniers will go on denying, and their denial will find willing ears. That's why individuals like me, using what means we have, should never, ever, stop reminding the world of what went on at Auschwitz.

In what way were you and your family affected by the Holocaust? Do you have a personal memory of that time?

In 1943, I was four years old when a group of thugs with the Arrow Cross – Hungary's equivalent of the Nazi party – took away my father to a slave labour camp. We never saw or heard from my father again, and we never learned how he perished. My mother, sister and myself were saved from the Holocaust by Christian friends. Until the end of the war, we lived with them in the countryside, on their farm.

How emotionally draining has this project been for you? Was there a point where you thought you couldn't keep going?

I was at Auschwitz-Birkenau for the better part of three days. You don't get hardened to the atrocity. The realization of the meaning of the place, the incredible inhumanity of it, only strikes you deeper. You could easily fall apart, and falling apart would be right and proper. I nearly lost my composure a number of times. But I had to stay focused in order to achieve my goal. Most people will never visit Auschwitz. Let them know it, then, through exhibitions like this, which offer a vision of what the Holocaust meant.

How were the arrangements made? Did the Auschwitz authorities give you immediate and unfettered access, or did it take some negotiation?

I was not restricted in any way. Arrangements were made for me by a Polish photographer, a friend of mine in Warsaw. The uncomplicated access that the Polish authorities provide is a tremendously positive thing. They now supervise visitors only to the extent of preventing theft or vandalism.

How many shots did you take? Why black and white?

I took almost a thousand shots. And to best show the drab awfulness of Auschwitz, the sense of desolation one feels there, the sadness and revulsion of the memories it compels, I felt the photos had to be in black and white.

How was the connection with the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts made? Did it agree to exhibit your photos before you went to Poland, or afterward? Have you previously exhibited at the museum?

I had never previously exhibited with the museum. After my trip to Auschwitz, I sent digital copies of my best two dozen photographs to every member of the museum's board. I suggested that these photos might comprise a suitable means of marking the 70th anniversary of the liberation of the most infamous of the Nazi death camps. I am extremely proud that the museum has chosen to display my work in association with the Anne Frank exhibit.

The travelling Anne Frank exhibition is primarily aimed at young people. How will your Auschwitz images complement that exhibit and add to the discussion on tolerance that its organizers hope to encourage?

What my photographs are saying, and I hope they are shouting it loudly and clearly, is: 'Look where intolerance leads. Look at the filth, horror and hell which hatred creates.' I would think that makes for a suitable addition to the Anne Frank story – a warning to young people, but also an encouragement to make a better world than the one they too often read about in the history books.

What is the future of your Auschwitz series after the exhibition closes? Will they be shown or published elsewhere?

At present, we have no post-museum plans. My hope, of course, is that the photographs will be adopted by an institution or corporation, and preserved for the very reasons I took the photos – to help perpetuate the memory of the Holocaust, and help ensure that "Never again!" does not fade into a hollow slogan. ■

A saint in the age of demons

Backstory

EROL ARAF

Pope Francis' recent visit to Turkey coincided with the 70th anniversary of one of the most daring rescue operations of World War II, conceived by Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli, the Vatican's ambassador to Turkey, who would become Pope John XXIII and would be canonized in 2014.

Roncalli's "Operation Baptism" was as dangerous as it was simple: it entailed the issuance of false baptism certificates to hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews at the time when Adolf Eichmann was deporting 430,000 souls from Budapest.

Roncalli worked with Rabbi Isaac Herzog, the chief rabbi of Jerusalem, and Ira Hirschmann, special envoy from the American Refugee Board, with the full support and participation of the Turkish authorities. They met in the church of St. Anthony of Padua in Istanbul to launch the operation in 1944.

"Roncalli listened intently as I outlined the desperate plight of Jews in Hungary," Hirschmann later recalled. "Then he pulled his chair up closer and quietly asked, 'Do you have any contact with people in Hungary who will co-operate?'"

Author Joseph D'Hippolito's article Pope John XXIII and the Jews, published by the Raul Wallenberg Foundation, mentions that Roncalli had heard reports of Hungarian nuns distributing baptismal certificates to Jews, mostly children. Nazi authorities in Hungary regarded these documents as authentic proof of Aryan descent and permitted the bearers to leave Hungary.

"Roncalli planned to reinforce and expand the operation – regardless of whether Jews were actually baptized. Hirschmann readily agreed," D'Hippolito wrote.

Roncalli used diplomatic couriers, papal representatives and the Sisters of Our Lady of Zion to transport and issue baptismal certificates, immigration certificates and visas – many of them forged – to Hungarian Jews. "Operation Baptism" exceeded the wildest expectations of all those involved in the rescue effort, and indeed, when the Russians liberated Budapest in 1945, it became apparent that more than 100,000 had been saved.

According to Roncalli's biographer, Thomas Cahill, the future pope, was first alerted to the fate of the Jews in occupied Poland by a party of Jewish refugees he met in Istanbul on Sept. 5, 1940. He helped them on the way to the Holy Land, and from that time, stood ready to facilitate the escape of Jews in whatever way he could, with clothes, money, documents and a quiet sense of common humanity that never left him. Indeed, whatever was in the heart of the reining pope in 1940, Angelo Roncalli was in no doubt about what his conscience was telling him.

"We are dealing with one of the great mysteries in the history of humanity," Roncalli wrote to a concerned nun in Bucharest. "Poor children of Israel. Daily I hear their groans around me. They are relatives and fellow countrymen of Jesus."

His accomplishments include the delivery of "immigration certificates" to Palestine through the Nunciature diplomatic courier, intervention before King Boris of Bulgaria in favour of Bulgarian Jews, helping Jewish refugees from Transnistria, using his influence to save Jews from deportation in Romania and Croatia, communicating with Nazi authorities in Greece about the fate of Jews in that country, rendering succour to Jewish refugees from France and Germany, co-ordinating rescue efforts with Raymond Courvoisier, Ankara director of the Red Cross, and using his moral authority with Hitler's ambassador to Ankara, Franz von Papen. His efforts resulted in the clandestine saving of countless Jews throughout Europe.

When Pope John XXIII passed away in 1963, thousands whom he had saved, as well as Jews, Christians and Muslims with whom he had worked, paid him the silent tribute of their tears.

He was truly a saint in the age of demons. ■

End of a matzah era, and Western Wall gender bender

Streit's to leave the Lower East Side

Streit's said it will close its 90-year-old matzah factory on New York's Lower East Side. Aron Streit, Inc., a family-owned firm, said it will leave its Rivington Street facility after the Passover baking season in April. "The economics just finally caught up with us," said owner Alan Adler. "It was very sad, a very hard decision to make." Adler is the great-grandson of Aron Streit, who started a bakery at a nearby location before opening the current factory in 1925. Streit's makes about 40 per cent of the matzah consumed in the United States. It will move its offices to its other facility in New Jersey that bakes macaroons and other products. It hopes to get $25 million for the six-storey building.

Iconic brand won't be in NYC anymore.

Transgender woman barred from Kotel

A transgender woman was denied access to both the women's and men's sections of the Western Wall last week. Kay Long, who designs gowns and costumes, visited the Kotel Jan. 5 with a friend from Madrid. Long was turned away from the women's section by an Orthodox woman patrolling the site who said she's not a woman, and she was barred from the men's section because she doesn't look like a man. "All that's left now is to take a picture and say a prayer from afar with the hope that it will be answered," she wrote on Facebook, under a photo of her outside the Western Wall plaza with the Kotel in the background. "Because God is everywhere and loves us all." She posted later that she hadn't intended to pray there and didn't want to make a scene.

A new Hollywood trend?

Actress Cameron Diaz married Benji Madden, guitarist for the punk band Good Charlotte, at her Beverly Hills home Jan. 5 in a Jewish ceremony, despite the fact neither appears to be Jewish. The wedding featured a crushed glass, chants of "mazel tov" and even a traditional yichud ritual, during which the couple was secluded after their vows. But unlike other celebrities who have dabbled in Kabbalah or converted, neither Diaz nor Madden appears to have done either. Speculation abounds about their reasons, but apparently a l'chaim is in order. ■

The politics of conversion

The two articles on the nature of conversion in Toronto and elsewhere ("The politics of conversion," Dec. 18) only begin to scratch the surface in dealing with some of the issues around conversion. And those issues, in turn, connect with the perennial question of "Who is a Jew?"

We may pride ourselves here in Canada on having a pluralistic society, but let's not kid ourselves: to the Orthodox rabbinate, and many Orthodox Jews, the other forms of Judaism are not legitimate, not acceptable, not good enough.

You can call that political, or you can identify it as ideologically based. But it is a fact that the genealogy of our people is interwoven with that of many non-Jewish wives and mothers, some of whom were known heroines.

The "politics of conversion" is not just about the autocratic or unfair practices of some converting rabbis. It is about the whole question of who is a Jew and the question of who gets to make that decision or set that policy.

The current situation, in which a few ideologues play God and set the rules for everyone, is bad for the long-term health of the Jewish People.

Israel and the Diaspora

I strongly disagree with Simon Adler's article ("Diaspora Jews shouldn't try to influence the Israeli election," Dec. 25).

Diaspora Jews should absolutely get involved in the Israeli election. They need us.

First, getting an outsider's perspective is helpful. Sometimes you can't see the forest for the trees, and getting an outsider's view is sometimes enlightening.

Second, Israel can't survive without Diaspora Jewry, because of the political, moral and financial support given by the Diaspora.

If Israel expects such support, it also must take into consideration the Diaspora's views if it wishes to continue to get support.

The election is one of the most important in Israel's history. Diaspora Jews need to have their voices heard.

Counting heads

Your statistic in Gematria (Jan.8) that in 2016 Palestinians will equal the number of Jewish Israelis in Israel and the West Bank, is wildly confusing.

Is the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics (PCBS) now calling every Israeli Arab a "Palestinian" and including them in their overall population stats? That's the only way that the number of "Palestinians" could equal the number of Israeli Jews by 2016.

If that's the case, the PCBS and the Palestinian Authority should ask themselves how many of those "Palestinians" will move to the wonderful new Palestinian state they are trying to create. My guess is none.

Israeli Arabs value the freedom and stability the State of Israel offers too much to fall for that foolishness.

The impossibility of peace

In his letter criticizing Yossi Klein Halevi's belief regarding the "impossibility" of reaching an acceptable peace deal with the Palestinians, Bernard Katz ("The impossibility of peace," Jan. 8), touts the "2002 Arab Peace Initiative endorsed by every Arab state" as refuting the impossible. But since that so-called peace plan upholds the right of Palestinian "refugees," who at this stage of the game amount to around five million people, to "return" to their "rightful" homes and thereby put an end to Israel as a Jewish state, it is clear why the Arabs would endorse the Saudi king's ideas.

It is also clear that the plan would not result in the sort of peace that Israel could or would accept, which is to say a peace that allows for its continued existence.

And let's not forget that, for most Arabs, the reality of a sovereign Jewish nation is anathema on religious grounds.

As such, pace Bernard Katz, King Abdullah and the Arab League, true peace will remain an "impossibility" for the foreseeable future and long thereafter.

RABBI-2-RABBI

What makes a Jewish leader?

It takes chutzpah to step into the role, but for those who anchor their leadership in Jewish values, it's never about them. It's about the task at hand.

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Fishman: Jewish leadership can mean two things: leadership by people who are Jewish, and leading in a way that reflects Jewish values. I am particularly interested in the latter – leaders who are able to extract from classic Jewish texts themes that can point toward what it means to lead in a way that is deeply Jewish.

Perhaps most fundamental of all is the theme of vision. The biblical character of Moses comes to mind. Moses cannot begin his mission before he has a sense of what he is being called upon to do. Encountering the burning bush was more than a mystical or prophetic moment for Moses – it was a vision of what the goals and objectives in his life were to be.

Before a leader can bring others "over there," he or she has to know where "there" is.

Rabbi Splansky: Apparently, it isn't so unusual for a thorn bush to catch fire in the desert. But Moses stopped to watch because he was curious. Why wasn't the fire consuming the bush? A Jewish leader is naturally curious.

Moses was a shepherd by profession, but he wondered about the physics of that burning bush. He wondered about greater freedom for a people he barely knew, but sensed he was somehow a part of. He wondered about a place called Israel, which he had only seen in his daydreams. Moses' curiosity carried him in the direction of Pharoah's palace.

A Jewish leader is driven by the need to find out.

Rabbi Fishman: And yet, Moses is doubtful. He claims the Jewish People will not believe him and doubts that the people will accept him as their leader, the one who will take them to freedom. God responds harshly to this and strikes Moses with a punishment that hints he has spoken badly about others.

The principle is that once a vision has been acquired, the role of the leader is to have faith in others. In addition to seeing the destination, a leader has to believe that the community is able to be a part of the journey.

Rabbi Splansky: The finest mark of a Jewish leader is loving loyalty, not blind loyalty. When we built the golden calf, God suggested to Moses: "I see that this is a stiff-necked people. Now let Me be, that My anger may blaze forth against them and that I may destroy them, and make of you a great nation." (Exodus 32:9-10)

But Moses did not take the bait. Even in the heat of his anger, he did not abandon his people. Instead, he defended them.

A Jewish leader stands by the people – stands with them and for them, and draws out the best in them.

Rabbi Fishman: Moses, in an act of despair, cries out to God: "the burden is too heavy… if this is how you are going to treat me, please kill me" (Numbers 11). This is Moses at the depth of despair.

And yet even within the bleak moments, a trace of inspiration can be found. When there is no one around to do what needs to be done, a Jewish leader will innately sense that this is why they are here, and that this is their moment.

Rabbi Splansky: A Jewish leader knows who she is and who she isn't; what he can do and what he cannot. She knows what she knows, what she has yet to learn, and also that there are things about God's world she will never know.

It takes chutzpah to step into a leadership role, but for those who anchor their leadership in Jewish values, it's never "about me." It's about the task, the need, the mitzvah at hand. A Jew steps into leadership because he feels duty-bound to offer up his best efforts in order to make God's world more whole. A Jew recognizes her talents are God-given, that his time on earth is God-given.

At first, it may seem chutzpadik to step into leadership, but when we see our potential for impact as a gift, a challenge, an opportunity and an expectation from the Divine, it's chutzpadik to say no. ■

Why Netanyahu had to be in Paris

According to reports, French government authorities asked Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu not to attend Sunday's unity rally in Paris, for fear his presence would be "divisive." He did not accede to the request, and for good reason. The leader of the Jewish state needed to be there to serve as a reminder that all Jews have a responsibility to stand united. In the wake of Friday's terror attack that left four Jewish Parisians dead, to do anything less would have been truly divisive.

The killings at Hyper Cacher emphasized, once again, the dangers facing Jews in France and across Europe. Mass emigration has never seemed more possible, though French and European authorities have been quick to speak in support of their Jewish communities, led by French Prime Minister Manuel Valls. "If 100,000 Jews leave," he said, "France will no longer be France." But if French Jews are to feel safe again, words won't be enough.

In order to ensure the safety of their Jewish communities, European leaders will have to act strongly, and quickly, against Muslim radicals who teach that killing Jews, and cartoonists, is a virtuous thing. Mainstream Muslim leaders should be asked to do their part, too – not as some sort of blame by association, but because their religion is also under threat. And Europe's Jewish leaders must proclaim that they will not be scared away, nor will they accept that anti-Semitism is the new normal, if they choose to stay.

That's a tall order, but perhaps this incident will be the final straw, the true impetus for real change, the moment when Europe decides to take a stand. Or maybe not – we've held out the same hope before, after all. We hoped things would change after Toulouse, when four Jews, three of them children, were shot at a Jewish school. And we hoped just a few months ago after four people were killed outside the Jewish Museum of Belgium in Brussels. We even hoped in July, when Parisian Jews were forced to barricade themselves inside a synagogue to avoid an anti-Semitic mob. A couple million people rallying for unity is a nice gesture, no doubt. But to truly effect change, it must be just the beginning.

That's why Netanyahu had to be in Paris on Sunday – not for the photo-op with world leaders, not even to remind the Jews of France they have a home waiting for them in Israel should they need it, but to serve as a symbol for Jewish unity and strength. His presence signalled that Jews all over the world are paying close attention, that we intend to stand up against anti-Semitism in all its forms, and that we expect everyone else who believes in human rights and democracy do the same.

As Jews around the world watched the attack in Paris unfold, all we could really do was hope and pray everything would somehow be OK, even if we knew deep down there was no way it could be. Let it be the last time we feel that way, because we are not powerless. We have a voice. That's why we proclaim: "Je suis Juif." ■ — YONI

Why the mainstream media ignore Palestinian casualties in Syria

Khaled Abu Toameh

More than 2,500 Palestinians have been killed since the beginning of the conflict in Syria three years ago, according to a report published recently by the Working Group for Palestinians in Syria. It revealed that 2,596 Palestinians have been killed since the beginning of the conflict in that country in 2011.

But this information has hardly found its way into mainstream media in the West. Even Arab media outlets have almost entirely ignored the report about Palestinian casualties in Syria. The reason for this apathy, of course, is clear. The Palestinians in Syria were killed by Arabs and not as a result of the conflict with Israel.

Journalists covering the Middle East do not believe that this is an important story because of the absence of any Israeli role in the killings. Arabs slaughtering, executing and torturing Palestinians is not sensational enough to grab a headline in a major Western or Arab newspaper. That is why most Middle East correspondents have chosen to turn a blind eye to the report.

According to the report, the victims include 157 women who were killed in the fighting between Bashar Assad's army and various opposition groups in Syria. It also said that 268 Palestinians were killed by snipers, while another 84 were summarily executed. Another 984 Palestinians were killed when their homes and neighbourhoods were shelled by the Syrian army and the opposition groups.

The report also reminded the international community that the Palestinian Yarmouk refugee camp near Damascus has been under siege by the Syrian army for close to 600 days. Approximately 160 residents of the camp have died as a result of the siege, the report said, and recently Muslim terrorists executed six Palestinians from Yarmouk camp after finding them guilty of "blasphemy."

Palestinians in Gaza take part in a rally to show solidarity with Palestinian refugees in Syria's main refugee camp Yarmouk a year ago. The camp has been under siege by the Syrian army for almost two years. ABED RAHIM KHATIB / FLASH90 PHOTO

A senior PLO official in Syria, Anwar Abdel Hadi, said that the Palestinians were executed by the Al-Qaeda-affiliated An-Nusra terror group.

Abdel Hadi said that only 15,000 Palestinians remain in the refugee camp, which until three years ago was home to some 175,000 people.

Another report published recently revealed that 264 Palestinians have died as a result of torture in Syrian government prisons over the past few years.

The most recent deaths in Syrian prisons occurred last month, when three more Palestinians died after being tortured. The three were identified as Bila Zari, Mohamed Omar and Mohamed Masriyeh.

These Palestinians were arrested by the Syrian authorities on suspicion of helping anti-Assad forces in different parts of the country.

The stories of the Palestinians tortured to death in an Arab prison have also failed to win the attention of the Western media. Had any one of them died in an Israeli prison or in a confrontation with Israeli soldiers, his story and photo would have appeared on the front page of many newspapers and magazines in the U.S., Canada and Europe.

By contrast, when a top Fatah official, Ziad Abu Ein, recently died of a heart attack after an altercation with Israeli soldiers in the West Bank, his story immediately caught the attention of the international media and human rights organizations. Many foreign journalists covering the Middle East covered the story of Abu Ein from every possible angle and conducted interviews with his family members and friends.

But the Palestinians who are being killed and tortured to death in Syria and other Arab countries have never received the same attention from the same journalists and human rights activists. Nor have the EU and UN, which called for an investigation into the death of Abu Ein, deemed it necessary to tackle the plight of the Palestinians in Syria.

And who has heard of the case of Zaki Hobby, a 17-year-old Palestinian who was shot and killed in early January by Egyptian border guards? The Palestinian teenager was killed because he came too close to the border between the Gaza Strip and Egypt. Witnesses said he was shot in the back and died instantly.

Once again, Hobby's story has hardly received any coverage because Israel was not involved in that incident. Had he been shot by Israeli soldiers on the other side of the border, the EU and UN would have called for an international commission of inquiry.

That Palestinians are being killed by Arabs does not seem to bother even the Palestinian Authority, whose leaders are busy these days threatening to file "war crimes" charges against Israel with the International Criminal Court. As far as the Palestinian Authority is concerned – and the media, the EU, the UN and human rights groups – the only "war crimes" are being committed by Israelis, and not by Arabs who are killing, torturing and displacing tens of thousands of Palestinians. And all this is happening while the international community and media continue to display an obsession only with everything connected to Israel. ■

How we fight back

Gil Troy

Last week, Islamofascists turned Paris, the city of love, into a city of blood. In a video seen repeatedly after their Charlie Hebdo massacre, the terrorists murdered a policeman, who was already hit, already waving his hands in surrender. Ahmed Merabet, a cop who was a fellow Muslim, asked, "Are you going to kill me?" And the terrorists did – showing what kind of people they are.

Last week they made it clear: yes, they are going to kill you if you are a police officer, just doing your job; they are going to kill you if you are a satirist, expressing your freedom to be outrageous and provocative and even wrong sometimes; and, yes, they are going to kill you if you are a Jew shopping for Shabbat.

These killers had much broader targets, of course. Once again, the Islamo-killers of 9/11 and 7/7 and Ottawa and Jerusalem and Bali and Madrid showed that they are going to kill you if you disagree with them, if you love freedom, if you refuse to join their sick Holy War against democracy and liberty.

We must stop kidding ourselves that if we only appease them, if we just meet their demands, they will somehow stop. As long as we live and love and prosper and thrive in the West, they will fight us.

Of course, the more we live and love and prosper and thrive – and fight – the closer we come to defeating them, understanding that total victory is the only acceptable possible outcome against these totalitarian fascists, just as it was the only acceptable outcome against the fascists of the 1930s and 1940s.

We must target the terrorists, their handlers, financiers, trainers and mentors. They must be hunted down and punished, using the full power of western democracies fighting an existential war of self-defence. These killers displayed their training and conditioning – training in the skilled, disciplined way they went about slaughtering fellow human beings, and conditioning, in the cold, dehumanization of others required for armed people to shoot unarmed writers, shoppers and police officers. These acts don't emerge naturally from poverty or discrimination, or even, "occupation." The Islamo-fascism we face is calculated, cultivated, conditioned and peculiar to Islamist civilization and ideology.

World leaders, including Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, German Chancellor Angela Merkel and PA President Mahmoud Abbas rally against terrorism in Paris last Sunday.

We must denounce Islamofascist ideology without inhibition. The fight against Islamoterrorism is a form of ideological warfare requiring moral clarity. Pretending that Islamism has nothing to do with Islam insults our intelligence, just as any resulting bigotry toward individual Muslim violates our ideals. We celebrate the martyred Muslim police office Ahmed Merabet. We honour Lassana Bathily, the Muslim clerk at the Hyper Cacher grocery store who ushered customers into a safe space in the basement. And, unlike our opponents, we treat every individual with dignity.

But those acts of respect – which come naturally to us – must not stop us from confronting Islamist ideology, and demanding that our non-Islamofascist Muslim brothers and sisters take responsibility for their co-religionists' acts. They must take back Islam from the Islamists.

We need to hear of imams using their mosques to preach tolerance and respect, not terrorism and revenge. We need to hear of curriculum reform in schools throughout the Muslim world, including in Canada, purging medieval teachings that demonize the infidel, the Jew, the Zionist, the American, the Canadian, the Christian, the westerner. We need to hear of Muslims walking out on preachers who are too extreme, boycotting schools inculcating evil, rather than supporting hate-mongers, indulging them and covering for them. We need to hear of crackdowns on the flow of money and ideology from fundamentalist centres in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere that encourage hatred, then hide that hatred behind false charges of "Islamophobia." We need to hear of Muslim moderates mobilizing and putting these Islamic fundamentalists on the defensive – ideologically, intellectually, socially, politically and militarily.

Meanwhile, we westerners must free ourselves from what cultural theorist David Harris calls our culture of guilt vis-a-vis their culture of blame. We should embrace what Daniel Patrick Moynihan called our imperfect democracies over their absolute dictatorships. We should stop perfuming Islamo-fascism with our shame regarding western shortcomings. For too long, attacks on Western racism, imperialism and colonialism, along with attacks on Israeli actions regarding the Palestinians, have been used to rationalize terrorism. Let's be clear: terrorizing innocents is unacceptable, whatever your perceived injustice.

And we should reinforce our words with actions. When terrorists kill to punish cartoonists, the CBC, the Montreal Gazette, the New York Times and all other media outlets must publish their work. We all then should forward the cartoons on social media, even if we find them tasteless, offensive, bigoted or wrong-headed. Our actions must show that freedom for the thought we hate is a defining principle of the western freedom that is under attack, and that we are defending what we believe in by proactively practising it publicly.

In the random roulette wheel of modern life, terrorists murdered 17 good people in Paris. We will win if hundreds of millions of us take the threat personally and fight back passionately, showing Islamofascists that every time they kill, they recruit millions more opponents rather than intimidating any of us. ■

USY interdating decision was a mistake

Rabbi Jarrod Grover

By amending its policy on interdating among its leaders, the youth arm of the Conservative movement, United Synagogue Youth (USY), has given us yet another example of a Conservative Judaism veering dramatically away from Jewish tradition.

In the giant centuries-old corpus of Jewish law, there is perhaps no clearer prohibition than that of marrying outside of the Jewish faith. From biblical times through the rabbinic period and in all of the Jewish legal codes, endogamy has been a universally recognized foundational pillar of Judaism. If the purpose of dating is to find a partner suitable for marriage, then the extension of this principle to dating life would seem clear and obvious, and similarly beyond dispute.

Not every Jewish organization or movement chooses to abide by Jewish law, and certainly not every individual. But Conservative Judaism affirms the binding nature of Jewish law over its rabbis and institutions. Though its interpretations sometimes differ from Orthodox legal opinions, the authority of Jewish law is a shared value. Why, then, would USY be apologizing for holding to religious standards, and in fact abandoning a major standard prohibiting its youth leaders from dating non-Jews?

According to the stakeholders, it seems the former language (which upheld the ban) sounded too negative, too exclusive, too judgmental. Many young people were involved in relationships with non-Jews, and others had parents of mixed religious traditions. For them, the absolute clarity of the code of conduct sounded offensive and outdated. It prevented many potential teens from rising to positions of leadership. The language was, therefore, softened and no one should be surprised by the media firestorm that resulted. Indeed, the Jewish world was rightly aghast. The 2013 Pew survey of American Jews proved beyond a doubt that marrying a Jewish spouse is the most important factor for the survival of Jews and of Judaism. USY should be using all of its efforts to advance and promote Jewish friendships, relationships, and even marriages. This is why so many parents encourage their children to get involved in USY in the first place.

We should not dispute the importance of creating welcoming institutions. We have a responsibility in our day to reach out to the growing number of Jews who are disconnected from their community. But the suggestion that Judaism must accommodate and sanction people's decisions and lifestyles, no matter what they are, is preposterous. We must welcome every sinner, but not any sin. It's a difficult tension to sustain in the short term. Yet, people ultimately end up losing respect for organizations that sacrifice their own integrity for convenience and appeal.

I am reminded of a classmate of mine at the Jewish Theological Seminary who became a more committed Jew because he respected USY's leadership standards. He was very involved in USY and wanted badly to serve in leadership positions he was not eligible for because neither he nor his family were observant. He understood the importance of the standards and respected them as fundamentally in consonance with Jewish teaching. He ended up not only changing his Jewish practice, but also influencing his whole family. They all became much more engaged and observant, and he is now one of the leading young rabbis in the Conservative movement. Indeed, high standards can also inspire.

We pray daily in the morning service that God should open our eyes and enlighten us in His Torah. The words are an expression of our humility and a reminder that we are a faith with great and difficult demands. This same prayer's ending is even more critical. Though we admit our weak understanding, we nonetheless proclaim "we shall never be ashamed, and never afraid, now and forevermore." This prayer speaks to those who seek to compromise, apologize for and soften Judaism for the sake of popular approval. Perhaps these folks should be reminded to practise what they pray. ■

Palestinian Authority appropriates Christmas story

Mordechai Ben-Dat

Truth is the foundation of justice.

This notion will not astound anyone raised in a democratic society protected by the rule of law. Disputes between parties, as between states, can only be fairly adjudicated with at least a minimal mutual agreement regarding the facts. Absent truth, there are no facts, only prevarication or propaganda. Absent truth, there can be no justice.

It therefore offends conscience and even respectful discourse when Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas pleads for justice from the western world, as he did last month, by claiming that Jesus was a Palestinian.

"We celebrate the birth of Jesus, a Palestinian messenger of love, justice and peace, which has guided millions from the moment that his message came out from a small grotto in Bethlehem over 2,000 years ago. His message resonates among all of those who are seeking justice and among our people who have been the guardians of the holy sites for generations. It resonates in our prayers for our people in Gaza," Abbas said in his annual Christmas holiday message. (My emphasis.)

Nor was Abbas the only PA official to propagate this message. Rather, he was part of an orchestrated campaign claiming Palestinian lineage for Jesus. A cadre of key PA officials, including the supreme sharia (Islamic law) judge and adviser to Abbas on religious and Islamic affairs, the governor of Ramallah, and the chief PA security spokesperson all repeated the same misinformation.

Indeed, piling one falsehood upon another into a tower of lies, the PA saturated the West Bank with "All I Want for Christmas is Justice" as their propaganda message.

Alongside their zeal to strip the Jewish People of any historic claim to the Land of Israel, the Palestinian leaders are also prepared to strip the Christians of any historic or faith-based claim to Jesus. The PA mutilates the words and messages of the Christian Bible into unrecognizable form.

According to the Gospels, Jesus lived in Judea. He was a Judean. He was ridiculed by the Romans who crucified him as "Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Judeans".

The name "Palestine" was the creation of the Roman Emperor Hadrian in 135 CE, some 100 years after Jesus lived. To punish the Judeans after the failed Bar Kochba revolt, Hadrian replaced the name "Provincia Judea" with "Provincia Palaestina." In his venomous desire to destroy all traces of Judean nationalism, Hadrian even changed the name of Jerusalem to Aelia Capitolina. Judeans were killed, dispersed or sent away as slaves.

Abbas' claim that his people "have been the guardians of the holy sites for generations" is equally hollow. Father Gabriel Nadaf, the spiritual leader of the Aramean Christian community based in Jerusalem, tells a more a truthful tale about how Palestinian leaders have, or rather have not, safeguarded Christian holy sites.

Writing in the Israeli journal Meida last month, urging the world to "stand alongside Israel," Father Nadaf stated: "Bethlehem, the birthplace of Christ, had a clear Christian majority. Since 1995, when Israel handed the city to the Palestinian Authority, Christians have been leaving in droves. Today, Christians are only 15 per cent of the population. Some say it's even less. Elsewhere in Palestinian-run areas, Christians are also leaving, and in Hamas-run Gaza, the situation is even worse."

The truth is that most Middle East Muslim regimes are inhospitable to their Christian minorities. Father Nadaf again tells the tale: "The Middle East is effectively being cleansed of Christians. In the beginning of the 20th century, Christians constituted some 20 per cent of the population in the region. Today, it's four per cent and falling."

Our sages teach that truth and justice must be bound together to establish a structure of peace. It is discouraging that the leaders of the PA seem to take an opposite view. It seems that the truth is whatever they say it is. The consequences for justice, let alone peace, are grave indeed. ■

Blessed be today, for the future is uncertain

Rabbi Jay Kelman

In his classic work The Black Swan, Nassim Nicholas Taleb notes that we must expect the unexpected. As he notes, almost all great discoveries and historic events – such as the Internet, the personal computer, World War I, the dissolution of the Soviet Union and the September 2001 attacks – were totally unexpected. They can be explained, often with great insight, using hindsight only. Our ability to predict the future is pretty close to zero. Taleb first discussed his theory in relation to the financial markets, where black swans are all too common and the use of probability theory to contain risk usually ends in failure. One need look no further than the financial crisis of 2008, from which we have not fully recovered.

Who, even six months ago, could have imagined that the price of oil would drop by more than 50 per cent. Besides potentially saving Canadians $12 billion in 2015 (based on last week's prices), this drop has the potential, and has already begun, to have major geopolitical fallout. The price of oil is an issue of great interest to Jews, since the falling price is having a major negative impact on Iran. (And may the price continue to drop further and further!)

While stock markets, and people in general, hate uncertainty, there's little we can do to avoid it. Likely since the dawn of human existence, man has tried his best to defeat uncertainty, and we've done a reasonably good job. Advances in science, medicine, communications and all else have allowed us to conquer much, though not all, of nature. But we, by definition, have had much less success at conquering human nature. We are an unpredictable lot, prone to rash behaviour and ignoring the long-term consequences of our actions, even if we're well aware of them. Is it any wonder life is so unpredictable?

Despite man's desire for predictability, there's much to be gained from uncertainty. First and foremost, it should foster a connection to the Divine. Man is in need of help, and we're meant to look toward heaven for that help. There are few places where uncertainty reigns as supreme as in the Land of Israel. This is no coincidence. God, the Torah tells us, specifically chose the Land of Israel for the Jewish People because of its lack of rain. This, the Torah hoped, would cause man to realize that it is God who is the ultimate provider of man's blessings.

That the recent economic surprises are having a psychological impact can be seen in a recent poll showing an 11 per cent decrease in Canadians who feel confident they'll reach their financial goals in 2015. Perhaps most worrisome is that the drop is greatest among those 65 and older, with only 60 per cent being confident they'll reach their financial goals – versus 81 per cent in 2014.

As is so often the case, our perceptions of the economy turn into self-fulfilling prophecies. Those who aren't confident about the future often act in ways that help ensure our economic fears will materialize. There's no doubt the economic recovery would greatly pick up speed if corporations spend some of the approximately $2 trillion they have sitting in cash (or the equivalent) on their balance sheets. (Apple alone has about $165 billion in cash. To put that in perspective, the government of Canada spent $276 billion in 2013.) Having little confidence in what the future may hold, they're most hesitant to do so.

The Talmud records that when the great sage Shammai would find a nice piece of meat, he would put it aside for Shabbat. Hillel on the other hand had a different attitude: "Bless God each and every day." We must strive to both enjoy life each and every day, and plan with uncertainty for the future. ■

A great adventure

Norma Baumel Joseph

When I was in my last year of college, my parents and in-laws tried to convince me to become a teacher. I refused. I wanted to go to graduate school in anthropology, thinking that would lead me to a more adventurous career. How foolish I was. I did not think about the great teachers I had learned from. Rather, I succumbed to stereotypical thinking about a profession that's always on the cutting edge, one that is always exploring the new frontier!

Eventually I did become a teacher, and I have never felt more fulfilled. I have learned that there is no greater adventure than the one that takes place in a classroom. Working with students is a way of exploring new worlds. The mountains we climb together far out-scale any known geographic heights. Engaging the human mind, opening up new avenues of discovery, sharing the road of learning are among the greatest undertakings human beings can be exposed to. After almost 50 years, I cannot imagine a more exciting life. I feel privileged to have experienced so many years of teaching and learning, and am somewhat ashamed of my initial reluctance.

The exchange of ideas is, of course, stimulating, and we have wonderful sayings in Hebrew about the wisdom learned from teachers and students. But I think the greatest adventure is not about accumulating knowledge as data. Rather, it is about learning how to think – excitement comes from challenging habits of the mind. When we embrace new modes of judgment and discernment, whole worlds open up. It's as if we are on a space shuttle of discovery.

But it is very hard to convince some people of these basics. Today, I feel that we are on a chartered course to demolish our educational structures. People in power talk about class size and pupil-teacher ratios as though we are on a factory line selling a product, not dealing with the human mind. According to some recent studies in Canada, in some university classrooms there are over 1,000 students and the full-time faculty size is being reduced. That is unconscionable.

Students need time with their teachers and professors. They need one-on-one time to discuss and discover. They should not be squished into a classroom. This thing called education is not about facts and figures. It's not about stuffing someone's head like stuffing a turkey. Education is much more subtle. It is about opening up a window so that a nuanced view can be established. It is enabling a dialogue so that multiple voices can be heard. It is about translating the present into future possibilities. You cannot do that without small discussion groups and seminars. You cannot possibly call it an education without full-time faculty spending quality time with students.

Treating our schools, especially our universities, as factories is selling our future short. It is not a path toward excellence, as some of the rhetoric of administrators would have us believe. It makes a difference if there are 1,000 or 20 students in a class. It makes a difference if the students talk with a professor or a teaching assistant. Teaching assistants and aides or interns are very important in course structures. They are means by which we train future professionals and they help manage larger classes. But they cannot and should not replace the full-time teacher or professor. Students should be encouraged to spend time with and discuss issues with their profs. That's what an education inaugurates.

We have had a great record of social benefits and networks building a strong educational system. Now much of that is in danger because of budget cuts and narrow-minded thinking. It is time for the people to voice our concerns so that our children won't suffer the consequences.

Education is a wonderful adventure, perhaps the greatest adventure we can afford. Open up the world with the right tools and structures. Let's give our children small classrooms and great professors. ■

Canadians rally for French Jews after attacks

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca

Montrealers rally in front of City Hall on Jan. 7.

"Tonight, I am Charlie. I am Jewish," Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre declared at a community vigil for the 17 victims of terrorist attacks in Paris last week, held at Montreal's Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation on the evening of Jan. 11.

That expression of solidarity with the four Jewish hostages who were killed in a kosher supermarket was also repeated by French Consul General Bruno Clerc and Aurelia Le Tareau, spokesperson for the Collectif Je Suis Charlie Montreal, which organized a march through downtown by an estimated 25,000 people earlier in the day.

The synagogue vigil, organized by Federation CJA, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and the Montreal Board of Rabbis, was attended by more than 500 people, under heavy security by both Montreal police and private guards.

The event was a commemoration of the victims, a show of solidarity with France, and an eloquent statement that terrorism must not prevail over democratic freedoms.

As Rabbi Reuben Poupko, who chaired the event, said, the tragedy in Paris is a reminder that Jews once again have been targeted and that the French Jewish community is living in fear. The four supermarket customers were murdered because they were Jews and were not random victims, he emphasized.

"It is obscene that in 2015, in a great capital of Europe, a city of enlightenment and culture... Jewish people, who have been there for generations and number half a million, are afraid...

"Our adversaries," he continued, "must learn that strength means to listen to others ridicule your most precious beliefs and react with silence. That is the price of freedom.

"Those who come to our countries should know that the prosperity and peace they find is not coincidental. It is a product of our values."

Federation president Susan Laxer said what happened in France makes it clear that the fight against terrorism is one for all who cherish democratic values.

Clerc and Le Tareau, a French citizen, both reiterated that it's unacceptable Jews feel unsafe in France and that anti-Semitism cannot be tolerated. They agreed that the Hyper Cacher shoppers were taken hostage and "assassinated" (Le Tareau's word) because they were Jewish.

"Without the Jews, France would no longer be France," said Clerc.

Israeli Consul General Ziv Nevo Kulman, along with Rabbi Poupko, attended the massive solidarity march during the day, which started at Place des Arts and ended in front of the French consulate on McGill College Avenue.

Nevo Kulman said the world must take action quickly against the "hatred and fanaticism" that is spreading globally. "In order to fight terrorism, we have to strike at the roots, at these groups' sources of funding, at countries that give them support."

Coderre called for action on a local level and said he plans to convene a meeting of religious leaders in Montreal.

"We are all going to work together to protect our freedom... Those values are universal and everybody has a duty to protect them. We're all part of the solution," he said.

D'Arcy McGee MNA David Birnbaum, a parliamentary secretary to Philippe Couillard, said the premier is in solidarity with the Jewish community in "unconditionally upholding freedom and security."

Although what Charlie Hebdo published was "provocative, and often distasteful and outrageous," its staff should not have feared for their lives, Birnbaum said.

It is "unspeakable stupidity," not only "evil cowardice," Birnbaum said, to think ideals can be killed.

GUEST VOICE

I won't change how I draw my cartoons

GARY CLEMENT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I have earned my living for the last 16 years drawing editorial cartoons for the National Post. I wake up every day, go through my morning routines, scan the news online, send a sketch or two to my editor, and then file my cartoon. Not particularly exciting stuff, and definitely not anything that could even vaguely be considered life-threatening. Until this week, that is.

I awoke Jan. 7, like everyone else in this part of the world, to the hard news from Paris, and I suspect my first reaction – a mixture of horror, shock and revulsion –was similar to everyone else's. My second reaction, one shared, I'm quite sure, by political cartoonists around the world, was an awareness that my job that day demanded an appropriate response in cartoon form.

But before I could get to that, I had to field a number of media interviews and found myself being asked the same questions repeatedly: Will you change the way you do things? Will you start to self-censor more rigorously? Will your editor and publisher exercise greater caution when it comes to publishing your cartoons?

I couldn't immediately answer any of those questions with any certainty. But I stated then – and still believe – that I will continue to work as I have always done and leave it to others to edit or censor. I also understand that my editor and publisher, like editors and publishers around the world, are facing a new reality in which they must carefully weigh the benefits of publishing potentially inflammatory material against the danger of imperiling the lives of their staffs. I do not envy them this task.

But I had other thoughts on my mind that day as well.

Over the years, I have struggled with the nagging suspicion that political cartoons don't matter quite as much as they used to. We are, after all, competing in a world where endless varieties of political satire exist across an array of media platforms. Add to that the notion that the aura of the political cartoons is increasingly old fashioned, as rapidly declining as print media itself.

The carnage at Charlie Hebdo overturned that old suspicion. The paper's cartoonists and editors were murdered for doing, more or less, the same thing that I do. The ideas and images that flowed from the pens of my fellow artists had sufficient power. They were considered dangerous enough to provoke an outburst of unprecedented violence.

I was going to end that paragraph with "senseless violence." But it wasn't senseless at all, at least not to the gunmen. They knew exactly what they were doing. They knew what they wanted to accomplish. Their goal was to intimidate anyone who wished to express opinions freely and openly on any matter they choose. Their aim was to shut down dissent and criticism, to silence, permanently, any idea not in agreement with their own ideas. They did not only seek vengeance, they sought to spread fear and terror. They wanted people like me to stop doing what I do.

> They did not only seek vengeance, they sought to spread fear and terror. They wanted people like me to stop doing what I do.

Deciding to cartoon professionally has never struck me as an act of heroism. It's not a feat of bravery. The toughest thing I've ever had to face is an angry letter to the editor and maybe a couple of cancelled subscriptions. I didn't know any of the Charlie Hebdo artists personally and had only a passing acquaintance with their work, but I feel certain none of them got into cartooning to become heroes either. It was just what they did. It was their calling. And they most certainly did not deserve to die for it.

That's why I won't change what I do. To do any less would be to dishonour the memories of the 12 victims of unreasoning fanaticism. ■

Gary Clement is the National Post's editorial cartoonist.

UJA Past Chairs Council

Community Leadership At Its Best!

23 years of UJA campaign chairmanship, ranging from 1962 to 2015, is represented in this historic photo that was taken on August 26, 2014 at Oakdale Golf & Country Club. The UJA Past Chairs Council, consisting of leaders who have chaired UJA's Annual Campaign, meets three times annually to stay current, offer their wisdom and guidance, as well as brainstorm big ideas that continue to strengthen UJA's Annual Campaign, Toronto's Jewish community and Israel. We thank these leaders for their ongoing generosity and dedication in helping us shape and build Jewish Toronto.

Facebook won't remove page promoting 'Jewish ritual murder'

plungen@thecjn.ca

When it comes to manifestations of anti-Semitism, Bernie Farber has seen it all. But the former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, and before that its director of community relations, was shocked to find an anti-Semitic blood libel rooted in medieval prejudice featured prominently on a 21st century technology.

Almost as bad, said Farber, is that Facebook, the social networking platform, has refused to do anything about it.

Despite his complaint, Facebook refuses to remove a page that labels itself, "Jewish ritual murder community."

Decorated with Christian iconography, the page carries the accusation that, "Jews admit ritual consumption of Muslim and Christian children's blood to gain success in life."

The site includes images of newspaper articles, photographs and other items that purport to show that Jews feast on gentile blood.

Farber believes the posting violates Facebook's own criteria for maintaining community standards. In fact, in a section labelled "hate speech" that is part of "Facebook Community Standards," the social networking site states, "Facebook does not permit hate speech."

"While we encourage you to challenge ideas, institutions, events, and practices, we do not permit individuals or groups to attack others based on their race, ethnicity, national origin, religion, sex, gender, sexual orientation, disability or medical condition."

Accusations of Jewish ritual murders fall squarely in that definition, said Farber. For centuries, that sort of allegation "led to pogroms… and led the way to the Holocaust."

"Jewish ritual murder is the epitome of not upholding community standards. It's sickening."

Nevertheless, when he complained to Facebook online, he was told in a written response, "We reviewed the page you reported for harassment and found it doesn't violate our community standards."

In an email response to a CJN inquiry, a Facebook spokesperson stated, "We aim to find the right balance between giving people a place to express themselves and promoting a welcoming and safe environment for our diverse, global community. Not all disagreeable or disturbing content violates our community standards. For this reason, we offer people who use Facebook the ability to customize and control what they see by un-following, blocking and hiding the posts, people, pages and applications they don't want to see."

A Jan. 8 screenshot of the 'Jewish ritual murder' Facebook page

"I thought it would be easy to explain why this page would come down," Farber said. On an unrelated occasion, in October 2014, Facebook removed the photo of a woman breastfeeding a baby on the grounds it violated its policy on nudity, but it wouldn't take down blatant anti-Semitic material. (Facebook eventually republished the photos after a public backlash.)

"Facebook ought to be ashamed of itself."

Farber said he doesn't know where the page is hosted, but he is asking York Regional Police to investigate the host for violating Canada's anti-hate laws.

Making the incident even more disturbing, he said, was that the page had received 792 "likes." ■

Ivey students revive Israel trip for non-Jews

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

When Daniel Taylor and three friends – all students at the University of Western Ontario's Ivey Business School – approached the school's program office to inquire about the Israel reading week trip that had run in years past, they were told it wasn't happening this year.

Nobody wanted to do the work of organizing and fundraising for the trip, geared to exposing non-Jewish students to Israel's rich business environment.

"We just figured, this is something we could do," said Taylor, 21, explaining they felt passionate about showing non-Jews a lively and innovative aspect of Israel they wouldn't otherwise experience.

He, along with fellow fourth-year students Daniel Khazzam, 23, and Josh Greenbaum, 21, and third-year student Mike Zagdanski, also 21, spent last summer fundraising – no small undertaking, since the few private donors who had carried the trip's cost during its four prior years (it didn't run last year) had largely moved on to other projects.

"It's become more of a grassroots effort than ever before," Taylor said. "It's gone from three or four donors in the past to, this year, 40-plus private donors."

The eight-day trip, which will take place during reading week next month, costs about $100,000 total. To make it affordable for the 24 participants registered, each of whom will pay $1,900, Taylor and his friends had to raise around $42,000.

With the exception of the organizers and two additional Jewish students, none of the attendees are Jewish, something Taylor stresses is "the whole point."

By familiarizing people of varying backgrounds, many of whom have no prior knowledge of Israel, with Israeli companies and the country's extensive startup scene, Taylor said, "we'll show them Israel isn't just what they see in the papers, that there's another side of it that is, obviously, wonderful."

"The big goal," he added, "is for these students to eventually go on to lead companies and look back upon Israel positively – maybe even integrate it into their businesses."

The itinerary, which Taylor said borrows from previous years but also incorporates new elements based on the organizers' interests and connections, is dense and far-reaching. Students will travel around the country and meet with a variety of businesses, from large firms to small-scale entrepreneurs and, Taylor said, "small venture capitalist guys you've never heard of."

They will, for example, travel to the Golan to visit the Israeli-built, international irrigation company Netafim, as well as Google and Facebook offices in Tel Aviv, the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange and the Israeli branch of U.S. financial services firm Morgan Stanley.

Participants will also hear a range of speakers, including the chair of the political science department at Hebrew University, a former government official from Israel's Labor party and the founder of a Palestinian human rights group.

Students will be accompanied by Ivey professor Amos Nadler and will receive university credit for the week, assuming they complete written assignments throughout and a final paper upon their return.

For those going on the trip, the 2009 book Start-up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle, is required reading.

Taylor emphasized the week is "no vacation," and that given the high demand, he and fellow organizers were able to be "very selective" when it came to choosing "high-calibre, high-achieving participants for the trip… most of whom have fantastic jobs lined up for when they're done school."

He added, "We want those who attend to be involved in future decision-making [in the business world] and to, down the road, look upon Israel with favourable eyes." ■

GUEST VOICE

Remembering our friend 'Yitz' Kurtz

Our minyan will never be the same

DAVID KOSCHITZKY AND JACK SAMUEL

Yitzchak Kurtz and his wife Debbie

We lost a good friend on Jan. 3. It was a lopsided friendship in a sense, as there is no doubt we derived much more from our relationship than he did. Yitzchak (Isaac) Kurtz was a gentle, soft-spoken man. Though he stood 6 feet 6 inches tall, his stature was not measured in physical terms, but rather by the example he set. And using that scale, he towered over all of us.

Most of you reading this probably never met Yitz Kurtz. Allow us to try and explain why he meant so much to so many. To us, Yitz represented everything one could ever aspire to be. If one verse could sum up his life, it would be Psalms Chapter 1, Verse 2: "But his desire is the law of the Lord and he meditates on this law day and night."

Yitz epitomized modern Orthodox Judaism, though he himself never liked labels. He made God's Torah his Torah, and it was his life. But Yitz never confined himself to the "four amot" of Torah (about six feet, the personal space limit for each person). He instead took the Torah with him throughout his journey through life.

Like his father, Yitz was an engineer. He specialized in biomedical engineering, designing medical machine interfaces that helped improve quality of life for those with physical disabilities. He was innovative, dedicated and highly respected by his peers.

Yitz was also a talmid chacham (wise or knowledgeable student). He did not have a photographic memory – his memory was even better than that. He could comprehend a halachic issue in a three-dimensional way, understanding it so well that he knew exactly what was written, not only because he remembered it, but because it had to be written that way to make sense.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about Yitz was that his sheer brilliance – in science, in technology, in all manner of secular knowledge and certainly in Torah scholarship – was surpassed only by his humility. The last thing Yitz ever wanted was the "glory" that should come with such genius. He was smarter and more knowledgeable than nearly anyone he spoke with, but he always made you feel that your opinion was special, and to be valued. How he did that, with such patience and grace, is beyond our understanding.

Yitz was a fifth-generation Toronto Jew. One of the oldest Jewish cemeteries in Toronto, on Jones Avenue (near Danforth and Pape), is full of Kurtz family members. And Yitz continued the family tradition of overseeing its upkeep. Yitz was also a community man. It wasn't only that he supported the community, it wasn't only that he led the community. He continually made the community better.

For the last five months, Yitz was unable to attend the minyan that he had helped create, build and lead. No problem. The minyan came to Yitz. Volunteers made a weekly or holiday minyan at his home. And those of us who attended the regular minyan made sure to visit him afterward. We did this not only because it was the right thing to do, but because we yearned for our community, which meant we yearned for Yitz.

One cannot talk about Yitz without mentioning his wife, Debbie. Some couples supplement each other – Yitz and Debbie complemented each other. Name the characteristic and they were the complete opposite of each other. But boy did they make it work. No one left a visit to Yitz Kurtz without commenting on how Debbie made Yitz laugh, how she was rock solid and how she made everyone feel better about the situation.

Every synagogue has a ner tamid, a continuous light. For our community, that light has been flickering since Yitz passed two Shabbats ago. We will continue, but we will never be the same.

Yitz was only 54. He will be missed terribly. We are, however, so much richer for having had even this shortened period of his influence in our lives. ■

David Koschitzky and Jack Samuel are members of the Or Chaim Minyan in Toronto where the late Yitz Kurtz davened.

Founder of '50s-era grocery stamps dies

RON STANG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, WINDSOR, ONT

Doreen Bricker

One of the creators of southwestern Ontario's version of legendary grocery store stamps – and a major contributor to Windsor's Jewish community – has died.

Doreen Bricker, 87, died Jan. 2 of cardiac arrest.

"She'd just been recently diagnosed with cancer," daughter Sandi Malowitz said. "She was being treated, and we were very hopeful, as was she, that she would have a lot more time to be together."

Doreen and first husband William Silver founded the S & M Premium Company in the mid-1950s, a loyalty program that quickly became a hit with Windsor-area shoppers at one of the city's formerly largest grocery chains, N & D Supermarkets.

"It was being done in the United States," son Ron Silver said. "S & H Green Stamps were very popular there."

Doreen and William started the company and contracted with N & D as well as several other retailers, including an independent grocery store and various gas stations.

"They would buy the stamps from S & M and then they would distribute them to their customers," Silver said. "When they bought $30 worth of groceries, they would get X amount of stamps, and then they would put them in their little book, and then they would come to the S & M store and redeem them."

Originally the supermarkets themselves had showrooms containing a variety of S & M redeemable products, from blenders to cookware, luggage to patio furniture.

"You could get your Timex watch and alarm clocks and all kinds of things," Malowitz said.

The couple then set up an independent store in an adjoining shopping plaza.

N & D was a legendary chain for which some Windsorites still wax nostalgic. S & M stamps' success was directly attributable to the chain's popularity.

"Those grocery stores had the big percentage of the Windsor market for many, many years," Silver said.

The couple loved retail. Doreen handled the books and served customers up front, but eventually started buying at trade shows.

S & M also published a catalogue containing pictures of the myriad consumer items that could be obtained using the stamps.

Doreen was born in Windsor and the family attended Congregation Beth El.

Malowitz said both her parents were founding members of the Reform temple and volunteered widely both there and at the Windsor Jewish Community Centre. Malowitz herself just retired after working 33 years at the centre.

"Both of them had a big influence on us," Malowitz said. This included "the importance of family and celebrating holidays," she said. "Both my brother's family and I were always together. My parents really instilled that in a very wonderful and loving way." ■

De Corneille pioneered Jewish, Christian reconciliation

plungen@thecjn.ca

Roland de Corneille was an Anglican priest and member of Parliament for Eglinton-Lawrence in Toronto for three terms from 1979 to 1988, but he is perhaps best known in the Jewish community for his advocacy of Jewish Christian reconciliation and his role in launching the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group.

De Corneille passed away in Toronto on Dec. 30. He was 87.

Born in Switzerland, de Corneille grew up in France and moved to the United States, where he studied at the General Theological Seminary. He later moved to Canada, where he graduated from the University of Toronto's Trinity College in 1953 as an ordained Anglican priest.

In the early 1960s, he headed an Anglican missionary program aimed at converting Jews, but in 1966 he wrote the book Christians and Jews: The Tragic Past and the Hopeful Future.

He is credited with being among the first to urge churches of various denominations to change their attitude toward Jews. He launched interfaith discussions in the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of the Anglican Church of Canada.

In 1971, he was appointed national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, where he worked until 1979.

"He was among the pioneers" in bringing Jews and Christians together, said Bernie Farber, former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress. "His biggest issue was anti-Semitism, and he felt somewhat guilty as a Christian for anti-Semitism. He basically devoted his life to eradicating [it]."

Victor Goldbloom, chair of Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Montreal, did not know de Corneille well, but recalled that his reputation was as an advocate for better understanding between Christians and Jews.

"He was one of the early leaders," Goldbloom said. "He was a vocal person who made himself heard at a time when Christian-Jewish dialogue was in its early days and didn't always have much depth. It was sort of a feel-good understanding, and as time went by, it had deeper significance and began addressing historical issues, historical anti-Semitism and Christian attitudes to Jews and Judaism.

"He was a pioneer. It was well before the Second Vatican Council and he was a contributor to Christian-Jewish dialogue in Canada," said Goldbloom, past president of the International Council of Christians and Jews.

"The concept of bringing Jews and Christians to sit down and talk about common issues was his," Farber said.

"Both the Christian and Jewish communities owe a debt of gratitude to Roland de Corneille for his steadfastness in speaking out against anti-Semitism at a time when not a lot of people were doing it."

His role in the parliamentary support group "was another way to express his desire to have Jews and Christians walk down the same path of reconciliation," Farber said.

"He was widely respected." ■

First kosher restaurant in decades opens in Winnipeg

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

Maxim Berent says you don't have to be Jewish to enjoy the pleasures of BerMax Caffe + Bistro – Winnipeg's first kosher gourmet restaurant, which opened for business just before Chanukah in south Winnipeg.

"About 80 per cent of our customers aren't Jewish," says the young designer and entrepreneur. "People come for the food, the Italian ambience [the chairs are from Italy and Rome street scenes dominate the walls] and our Illy coffee. We are the only designated Illy café in western Canada."

(Illy espresso coffee, Berent explains, is kept in airtight containers until it is served so that the coffee is always fresh.)

The 50-seat milchik BerMax Caffe menu includes soups made from scratch, crepes, sandwiches, unique salads, pizzas and pastas, bakery products prepared in-house, and a variety of yogurts and beverages. Berent says many of the food ingredients are from Israel – as is the Italian chef – and most of the equipment was brought in from Italy.

The standout chandelier, he adds, was made in Montreal by an Orthodox Jewish artisan who has also made chandeliers for top hotels in Las Vegas.

It has been several decades since Winnipeg last had a standalone kosher restaurant. The Bathurst Street Deli – which closed a more than a decade ago – was independently owned (and under Chabad supervision, as is BerMax Caffe) but was part of a larger kosher grocery store.

The only other kosher eat-out options here are Shmoozer's Restaurant – a cafeteria inside the Asper Campus – and the fixed lunches at the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, a senior's drop-in centre in North Winnipeg.

Although Berent and his family have only been in Winnipeg for 10 years – they came from Russia by way of Israel – the personable Berent has had an outsized influence on his new home.

Berent was 15 when he arrived here, and, you might say, he hit the ground running.

The then-new Gray Academy student's graphic arts ability was quickly recognized, and he found himself in great demand from Jewish organizations designing posters, flyers and calendars.

He graduated from Gray Academy, Winnipeg's Jewish community day school, in 2008 and entered the faculty of architecture at the University of Manitoba. But despite his workload in architecture, Berent still found time to help out a professor in the faculty of fine arts, work in his family's millwork manufacturing business (BerMax), and serve as president of Hillel and co-ordinator of a newly formed branch of the Jewish Business Network at U of M.

Currently enrolled in a four-year interior architectural design program in San Francisco, he still found time to design and help (with his father) supervise the construction of the BerMax Caffe. (Construction began in July.)

The Caffe concept, Berent says, grew out of the family's plan to open a residential design showroom at the location. (The main BerMax plant, specializing in commercial millwork design and manufacture, is located just north of Winnipeg.)

"It seemed like a good idea to open a restaurant next door to both serve our residential design customers and also show off our work," Berent says, noting that all the countertops and cupboards are BerMax-designed and manufactured.

The family decided to open a Chabad-supervised establishment because of their ongoing relationship with Chabad here. Berent notes that BerMax built the large Aron Kodesh for the three-year-old Chabad Centre, which is just a few blocks away from the restaurant.

Currently, BerMax Caffe is open from 8 a.m. to 9 p.m. weekdays and Sunday.

"We close early Friday for Shabbat," Berent says. "We are planning to extend our hours of operation soon and, next winter, we will open on Saturday evenings after Shabbat."

He is also considering opening more BerMax Caffes in Winnipeg and elsewhere. ■

DIVORCE AND ADULTERY

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP

It makes no difference what causes the split. I can't count the number of times a new client will come to me with the details of their spouse's infidelity. "I came home one day and he/she was with my best friend. What was that? I could never forgive him/her." Surprisingly, Canadian law no longer rewards catching your spouse in flagrante delicto. You don't get extra spousal support, better rights to your kids, such as custody or more access. You also don't get a a bigger slice of the property split. Some may recall one instance in BC a few years back where a Judge awarded woman compensation for severe mental suffering because of her husband's adulterous behavior. That was an oddball case. Generally such an analysis does not apply because of an amendment to Canada's Divorce Act that conduct during marriage cannot play any role in calculating spousal support.

Normally, a spouse must wait one year from the date of separation to obtain a divorce order. So the only "benefit" is that under the Act a spouse who claims for a divorce based on adultery is that he/she is entitled to a divorce without waiting out the year. However, this benefit has little practical benefit. Most people who are the victims of adultery are hardly in an emotional place where they are ready to remarry right away. It usually takes at least a year for many people to readjust and socially reintegrate after being the victim of an adulterous affair in any event. However, for the adulterer, it's a great benefit, since if his spouse does decide to sue for divorce under a year then the spouse who indulges in adultery can remarry his or her lover much earlier than expected. I would imagine that this is hardly the result that was anticipated when these amendments were enacted.

Adultery usually traumatizes but the reaction will vary. You can only bend a tree so far. Some try marriage counselling. Others leave the marriage immediately. And then there are those so dependent, so trapped by their economic circumstances or fearful on how divorce will affect their kids, that they internalize their hurt and look the other way. If you find it hard to believe that someone can actually live this way, try to fill the shoes of the person who has to advise him/her to get help. Some spouses live this nightmare for years before breaking loose.

If you know of anyone quietly suffering, be a good friend. It is a very lonely experience. The law simply no longer gives any remedy.

IDF chief of staff visits colleagues on 'farewell tour'

For three days last week, Israeli Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz was in Toronto and Ottawa as part of what Canada's Department of National Defence (DND) dubbed his "farewell tour."

Gantz, chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), met his Canadian counterpart, Gen. Tom Lawson, as well as other senior military and defence department officials and held "high-level discussions on military and security issues."

Then it was on to Washington, where Gantz again made the rounds, meeting senior military and defence officials.

It's a measure of the high regard and close relations between the two countries that Gantz visited Canada, said Col. Adam Susman, the defence attaché of Israel to Canada. Gantz is set to retire from his role atop the IDF, and Canada was on his short list of countries to visit, Susman said.

Susman, who assumed his post in mid-summer for three years, accompanied Gantz on his travels in Canada. The relationship between the Canadian and Israeli militaries is friendly and respectful, he said.

Canadians clearly see it the same way. "Israel is Canada's closest ally in the Middle East, and our two countries enjoy strong military relations on a variety of fronts," Lawson said. "This bond has been strengthened under Gen. Gantz's watch, and reinforced by today's meeting. It has been a pleasure working with Gen. Gantz during his tenure as chief of the general staff, and I wish him success in his future endeavours."

Although he wasn't available for an interview with The CJN, Gantz expressed his deep appreciation to his Canadian colleague for the Canadian involvement in the changes in the Middle East and specifically for the Canadian efforts to combat the Islamic State. According to the DND, Gantz suggested further intensification of military co-operation between Canada and Israel.

Gantz's visit comes in the aftermath of the January 2014 Strategic Partnership Memorandum of Understanding, which committed the two countries to develop their bilateral relationship, including defence and security.

"Canada and Israel enjoy close military relations at all levels, including co-operation in the areas of counter-terrorism, training, search and rescue, intelligence, command and control and new technologies," DND stated in a news release.

"The DND and Canadian Armed Forces have deepened our ongoing interactions and continue to share best practices with the Israeli Special Operations through training visits, exchanges and participation in exercises.

"Canada's defence relationship with Israel has brought us considerable operational benefit through the exchange and purchase of Israeli unmanned aerial vehicles and counter-improvised explosive device equipment," DND stated.

A key part of Susman's job is to facilitate those exchanges and foster the relationship between the Canadian military and Israeli defence industries.

"The relationship between Canada and Israel is very good," he said. "The two prime ministers are very close, and things are going on between the ministry of defence and the military. There is quite a lot of co-operation between the countries and the militaries."

Susman said his appointment as military attaché reflects the friendly relationship between the two countries and reciprocates Canada's posting of a full-time defence attaché in Tel Aviv.

"It shows we mean business. We're serious in upgrading our relationship," he said.

Susman arrived in Canada right around the time Israel launched Operation Protective Edge, the IDF campaign to end Hamas rocket attacks from Gaza.

"Every few days, I gave [Canadian officers] a briefing if they wanted, and they wanted," he said.

That helped inform Canadian soldiers about the difficulties of "underground warfare," a reference to terror tunnels uncovered by the IDF. "Israel is a place where we have many lessons learned regarding urban warfare and underground warfare, and Canada can take Israel's lessons learned."

Susman also referenced the Islamic terrorist attacks this fall in Quebec and Ottawa, noting that Israel has had plenty of experience with domestic attacks and has knowledge it could relate to Canadian security personnel.

Susman is still getting used to life in Canada. He's travelled to military bases across the country, including the West Coast, and he marvels at Ottawa's snowy minus 26-degree weather as if there's something special about it. ■

82-year-old child survivor finally celebrates bar mitzvah

Though he's 82 and from a traditional Jewish family, Max Iland never had a bar mitzvah – until last year.

A child survivor of the Holocaust, Iland was in hiding with Belgian farmers when the time to read his portion came and went. Then, after the war, with his mother, Itka, and little brother, Kopel, dead, it was not something that was at the top of his agenda, or that of his father, Avram, who survived.

But in May 2014, with hundreds of youngsters participating in the March of the Living (MoL) looking on, Iland said the blessings and read his Torah portion in a moving ceremony at the top of Masada, in Israel.

Then again last month, back in his hometown of Sault Ste. Marie, Iland read another portion before family and friends at the Beth Jacob Synagogue.

For Iland, each bar mitzvah ceremony carried special meaning, both for himself and as an act of loving kindness – chesed – for Kopel.

Iland still gets choked up and puts a conversation on pause when he thinks about his brother, who was only three when he and their parents were deported to Auschwitz.

"My brother has been part of me ever since the war," said Iland, in a telephone interview from his home outside Sault Ste. Marie. "I know he didn't have a bar mitzvah. I thought he should have a bar mitzvah. I thought I'd do it for him and for myself. At Masada, the bar mitzvah was for my brother. In Sault Ste. Marie, it was for me."

At Masada, he was surrounded by young people eager to share in the life cycle event with the man they had come to respect.

Eli Rubenstein, spiritual leader of Habonim Congregation and of the MoL, officiated at both services.

The youngsters participating in MoL were in awe of Iland, said Rubenstein. And even in his hometown, many non-Jews attended the bar mitzvah, paying respect to one of the city's beloved school teachers, he added.

If Iland's bar mitzvah story is atypical of others of his generation, his postwar life is likewise unique.

After being hidden in attics, basements and haylofts by Paul and Lena Pirotte, he was reunited with his father.

They moved back to the Liege area of Belgium. Iland trained to be a tailor, but after serving two years as a commando in the Belgian armed forces, he moved to Canada, where the wide open spaces beckoned.

After working in construction in Montreal for one year and then on a tobacco farm near Tilsonburg, Ont., Iland moved to a logging camp near Sault Ste. Marie. He worked for 15 years as a logger. "It was the kind of life that I liked," he said.

He eventually enrolled in Trent University as a mature student, earning a teaching certificate. He went to work in the Soo as a high school special education teacher. He held that job for 25 years until he retired.

His love of the outdoors never waned. He still canoes, cross-country skis and chops his own firewood.

He heats his home outside of town with a wood furnace that he personally feeds several times a day, with wood he has prepared from his 70-acre plot of land. It takes 25 cords of wood each winter to heat his home, he said. (A cord is a pile four feet high, eight feet long, generally with an average piece length of 16 inches.)

For years, while enjoying the outdoor life of northern Ontario, Iland had not talked much about his wartime experiences. But as he got older, he wanted to return to Europe to see the place where his family had been killed.

He's been on the March of the Living twice. He enjoys talking to the kids, who he said are finding it hard to deal with the difficulties of being Jewish. Part of his self-imposed mission was to build up their confidence in dealing with bullies and reinforce their pride in being Jewish, he said. ■

Each person's journey towards Judaism is organic and individual. We invite you to explore Judaism and your growing relationship with it through the lenses of different Jewish denominations.

This course introduces the central Jewish ideas and practices, texts and experiences that form the foundation of a Jewish life. If you decide to pursue conversion, this course will give you the tools to choose an informed, healthy and whole commitment to Jewish living and the Jewish people.

This year-long, biweekly course is solely an educational endeavor. Enrolling does not guarantee conversion. An individual who chooses to pursue conversion will choose a mentoring rabbi/educator and will continue the process based on the rabbi/educator's specific denominational requirements.

Daiter's market to shut its doors April 2

DAITER'S
Fresh Market

PAUL LUNGEN

Daiter's Fresh Market, a family-owned business in Toronto, will close its doors for the last time on April 2 after more than 50 years at the same location.

Joel and Stephen Daiter, the brothers who operate the Bathurst Street landmark, announced that they have agreed to lease the premises first acquired by their father, Ron, and mother, Rene, in 1964. A children's clothing store will take its place, along with four rental units on the second floor where the restaurant's kitchens are currently located.

They had announced in October 2013 that they were prepared to sell the premises and eventually wind up the business, but in late 2014, they decided it would be best to retain ownership and rent out the space.

It's time to let go, the brothers said wistfully, as they reminisced about the store they began working in as kids.

The deli has always been a good business, but as they close in on 60 years of age – Joel is 59, Stephen is 55 – they said it's time for a change. They're no longer willing to put in the long hours and time away from their families that running a hands-on retail operation demands. And their children, witnessing first hand the kind of grind that's needed to make the business flourish, are not interested in maintaining the family legacy, they said.

The family business was originally started by their grandfather, Harry, in the late 1930s with a line of dairy products. In 1959, Ron moved the business north to Bathurst Street, a few buildings over from its current location, where Tov-Li is now situated. In 1964, they acquired the current premises, which was at the time a lumber store.

For the brothers, shuttering the shop is not a simple decision. The store was more than a business, it was like a Cheers, where people came not just to purchase the cheeses, salads, herring, lox and baked goods for which it became famous, but to shmooze and exchange news.

They grew up in the store and knew generations of customers by name. In some cases, four generations of the same family shopped in the store.

Customers were treated like family. In the few hours spent by The CJN at the store, the Daiters were greeted by a saddened clientele sorry to see the shop go. Tears and embraces were exchanged by the merchants and customers.

"I don't know what I'm going to do now," said Nikki Halpern, a longtime customer. "My earliest memory is coming here and your dad giving us pressed cottage cheese. I had to be three or four years old and I've been coming here ever since. I still get the cheese for noodle pudding, and the blintzes."

"You're closing? Where am I going to get my cottage cheese?" asked Marvin, a Filipino who is known to the shopkeepers in the neighbourhood as Moshe. "It's the best cottage cheese in the entire world, not just Toronto."

Marvin, a personal assistant for a neighbourhood resident, said he's been shopping at Daiter's for eight years. The person he replaced shopped there for 22 years.

Margaret Yanicki makes the trek to Daiter's a couple of times a month from her home in the High Park area. Sometimes she shops for a friend who lives on Queen Street. Daiter's caters to her low-sodium diet with cheeses that are fresh and tasty, she said.

"I get really fresh food. I'm going to miss the latkes. You can't find these kind of latkes," she said.

Yanicki, who hails originally from Saskatchewan, was in the store to shop for Ukrainian Christmas. In addition to the latkes, she also loves the borscht and the hamantashen.

"I'm just going to sit outside the store and cry," she said.

There were tears aplenty from the Daiters as well.

When the rental deal closed on Dec. 31, "it was very exciting, scary and surreal," Joel said.

"This is our lives," he added. "Anyone in a retail business knows it's not just a job. It's your life."

"I find, and Joel also, that it's bittersweet," Stephen said. "I'm not going to miss the hours [12 or 13 a day] and the physical work. But we're definitely going to miss our clientele."

After the store closes, just before Passover, the Daiters will take a rest. They plan to take the summer off and spend time with their families. After that, the future is unclear. There are investments to manage and perhaps new opportunities to pursue.

But it won't be in a retail setting like the deli.

Joel said he regrets that his father, Ron, who suffers from dementia, is not able to grasp what is happening. But his mom, Rene, who also worked in the store, gives the boys her blessing.

"It's time my kids had a break," she said. "They're living their father's life and it's time they had a break. Life changes. The old days are finished."

Customers can be heartened by the fact that the store's fresh products – its shmaltz herring, lox, salads and such – will be available right up to closing.

After that, you're on your own. ■

Victims remembered at Grand Synagogue memorial

Hundreds gathered with the leaders of France and Israel to remember the victims of an attack at a kosher supermarket near Paris.

French President Francois Hollande and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu joined several hundred members of the Jewish community at the memorial on Sunday night at the Grand Synagogue of Paris, also known as the Synagogue de la Victoire. Hollande did not deliver remarks at the synagogue.

The sister of attack victim Yoav Hattab, one of four Jews killed in an attack last week at the Hyper Cacher market, urged those gathered at the memorial to light four extra candles each Shabbat "so they may remain etched in our hearts." The sister, who asked not to be named, also played a recording of Hattab singing the Modeh Ani prayer.

Netanyahu called on Europe and the rest of the world to support Israel's fight against terror as supporters chanted his "Bibi" and "Israel will live, Israel will overcome."

"Like the civilized world stands united with France, so it needs to stand with Israel in its fight against the same enemy exactly: radical Islam," Netanyahu said.

"It's a short distance between the fatwa against [novelist] Salman Rushdie, to the murder of [film director] Theo Van Gogh in the Netherlands, to the attacks on Jews in Israel, to the murders at Charlie Hebdo and the Hyper Cacher," he added.

The gathering Sunday evening was organized by the Consistoire, the body responsible for religious services for the French Jewish community. It was held immediately after a march in which hundreds of thousands walked through the heart of Paris in support of democratic values.

The march was originally scheduled as an act of public protest following the slaying of 12 people on Jan. 7 by Islamist terrorists at the offices of Charlie Hebdo, a weekly which published many items lampooning Islam.

But organizers later expanded it to commemorate the victims of attacks at the supermarket and a police officer slain in Paris on Jan. 8 and Jan. 9.

Netanyahu commended the "remarkable bravery of French law enforcement" during the terrorist attacks and praised the actions of a Muslim employee of the kosher supermarket who helped several Jews escape into the refrigeration room without the shooter's knowledge. He also reiterated his call to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

"We need to acknowledge that we are facing a global network of radical Islam of hate. I believe this threat will grow when Europe sees the return of thousands of terrorists from the killing fields of the Middle East, the danger will be graver and it will become a grave threat to humanity if radical Islam gets nuclear weapons," Netanyahu said. "So we need to prevent Iran from getting nuclear weapons. We need to support each other in this fateful struggle against radical Islamic fanatics wherever they are."

Cherif and Said Kouachi, brothers in their 30s, perpetrated the attack at Charlie Hebdo. They were killed Friday when police overtook the printing shop where they were holed up north of Paris. That same day, Amedy Coulibaly, an associate with whom the brothers had been recruited as jihadists to fight in Syria, took more than 20 people hostage at Hyper Cacher and killed four. Coulibaly was killed when police stormed the shop.

According to some reports, Coulibaly had maps of Jewish schools in his car on Jan. 8, a day before the attack on Hyper Cacher, when he killed a police officer south of the city center.

French Chief Rabbi Haim Korsia said the march Sunday shows the French Jewish community "is not as isolated as we thought. For months we have been asking where is France? Today we saw France, and the France we saw was a spitting image of biblical descriptions of Jerusalem, where brothers unite."

The synagogue rally also featured the singing of Israel's national anthem, Hatikvah. ■

French Jews feel huge amount of fear

CNAAN LIPHSHIZ AND URIEL HEILMAN
JTA, PARIS

The two sieges that transfixed the world last Friday epitomize the problem Islamic radicalism poses in the heart of Europe: it's a danger to civilized society generally, but especially to Jews.

Now it's time for authorities to wake up to the problem and confront it, French Jewish leaders said after the hostage crisis at the Hyper Cacher kosher supermarket at Porte de Vincennes in Paris' 12th arrondissement that claimed the lives of four people.

"France is still under threat by those targeting it," French President Francois Hollande said in an address Friday. "Unity is our best weapon. Unity to show our determination to fight against all that may divide us and first and foremost to be implacable when it comes to racism and anti-Semitism. Because today, in that kosher shop, it was a terrifying anti-Semitic act that was committed."

Several thousand people gathered outside the kosher market for a vigil Saturday evening to commemorate the four victims of the attack.

Among the dead were Yoav Hattab, a 21-year-old son of a Tunisian rabbi who now lives in Paris. He recently returned from a Birthright trip. The other victims were Yohan Cohen, 22; Philippe Braham, 45, and François-Michel Saada, 55.

The Jan. 7 attack at Charlie Hebdo, a satirical newspaper that drew admirers and detractors for its provocative cartoons, was described by many in France as a national shock akin to 9/11. Tens of thousands of protesters gathered in Paris to memorialize the dead and express their support for press freedom.

Last week's attacks came on the heels of a long period of increased anti-Semitic attacks in France that grew worse during last summer's war in Gaza. Since then, synagogues have been set ablaze, Jews have been attacked and Jewish institutions have been threatened. In 2014, a record number of French Jews, some 7,000 people, left for Israel – many citing fears for their future in France.

In a statement, Simone Rodan-Benazquen, director of the American Jewish Committee's Paris office, citing a number of recent violent anti-Semitic attacks in France, said: "We have warned that the menace of rising anti-Semitism threatens French society at large. The Charlie Hebdo massacre makes clear that the war against France's democratic values is in high gear."

Despite assurances the government is committed to fighting anti-Semitism, French Jews are facing the Islamic jihadists alone, said Chlomik Zenouda, vice-president of National Bureau for Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism. "Thousands showed up to protest the Charlie Hebdo killings. That's nice. But they gathered at a square where just a few months ago public officials stood idly as around them calls were heard to slaughter the Jews. No one came out to protest that – no one but the Jews," said Zenouda, referring to inflammatory rhetoric at Gaza war protests held last summer at Place de la Republique.

The sad state of Israel's African 'infiltrators'

Yair Lootsteen

Jewish values – particularly ve'ahavta lere'echa kamocha (love your fellow as you love yourself) – and basic morality have taken me deep into the Negev desert to Holot, the "open" prison for African asylum seekers, on several recent occasions.

According to Israeli government statistics, at the end of 2014, there were nearly 46,500 African "infiltrators" residing in Israel, mostly from Sudan and Eritrea.

Almost all of them reached Israel during the last decade via our southern frontier with Egypt. That flow has been stemmed by a formidable barrier completed between the two countries in late 2013. In 2014, only 21 Africans managed to cross it.

Often, those picked up by the IDF along the border were put on buses and dropped off in Tel Aviv. Others made their own way there. It's said that at present, more than 20,000 live in that city's poorer southern neighbourhoods. There are smaller African populations in other cities and towns around the country. In Jerusalem, where I live, it's estimated roughly 2,500 Africans live and work in the city.

Southern Tel Aviv has suffered from the influx of these Africans. Many are unemployed. They loiter. Crime rates have risen. Tensions between Africans and their Israeli neighbours have risen. Israelis in these neighbourhoods are tormented.

From the outset, the government classified these Africans, people who chose Israel to better themselves financially, as "infiltrators." Based on this misguided perception, it set about making them miserable and encouraging them to leave. It made it difficult to employ them; didn't give them health care; half-heartedly processed their requests for refugee status (during these years, only three Africans have received such status); offered them money if they'd return home; and established prisons and holding facilities just for them.

Human rights NGO's have been fighting back. Remarkably, in decisions handed down in 2013 and 2014, the Supreme Court quashed as unconstitutional two separate amendments to a law authorizing detaining or holding Africans administratively for extended periods because they're "illegal infiltrators." In its latter decision, the court ordered that Holot be closed by December 2014.

Built at a cost of 323 million shekels ($97 million Cdn) and requiring another 100 million shekels ($30 million Cdn) annually to run, Holot houses 2,350 Sudanese and Eritrean men. The government has no intention of closing it, despite the court ruling. In December, before dispersing ahead of the upcoming election, the Knesset passed another amendment authorizing holding Africans in Holot for up to 20 months.

Putatively, detainees are free to leave during daylight hours, but they're prohibited from working while detained there and are required to attend a daily roll call (under previous legislation they had three a day). They must also be under lock and key from 10 p.m. till 6 a.m. every night.

On my most recent visit to Holot earlier this month, I sat with several inmate leaders just outside the facility's dusty gates. In contrast with previous visits, they expressed sad despair. They've done nothing wrong, miss their loved ones and have nowhere to go.

Going home isn't an option – they'd be imprisoned or worse. Sudan and Eritrea are among the most totalitarian regimes in the world today. No other country will have them. They're not provided any form of training or education in Holot. They pass the hours sleeping, watching TV, taking walks around the remote facility and wondering what the government will do with them at the end of 20 months. There's not a lot of hope, and increasingly, inmates are suffering emotionally.

Thankfully, this country has many well-intentioned individuals and organizations working tirelessly to improve the lot of these Africans and promote changes in government policy, which will also benefit Israelis living in south Tel Aviv.

Ve'ahavta lere'echa kamocha.

The Jewish state's government should know better. ■

Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, who was in Israel, sent a message that the world should not "sanitize" such attacks because that makes the next more likely.

What happened in Paris was felt in a very personal way by Marcelle and Armand Perez, even though they left France for Montreal in 1968. She still has two sisters living there that she had not been able to contact and was worried. She spent the day riveted to TV coverage.

"This is not the first time Jews have been attacked in France, but this was particularly sad. When you live in a democratic country, it is very hard to accept," she said. "Now this is a conflict not only for Jews."

"It always comes back to the Jews," said Sarah Bauer, a native of Belgium, whose husband, Julien, is from France. "Maybe now the people of France will wake up."

Elsewhere, CIJA urged the Jewish community in Canada to be calm and reassured that they're under no heightened threat.

"We have been in regular contact with police in major cities, and there is no indication that security alert levels have increased," said communications director Martin Sampson. "That said, we strongly encourage that existing security protocols be ensured... The police have stepped up their patrols around Jewish institutions.

"Take a deep breath. There is no need for panic, there is no intelligence to suggest we are at risk."

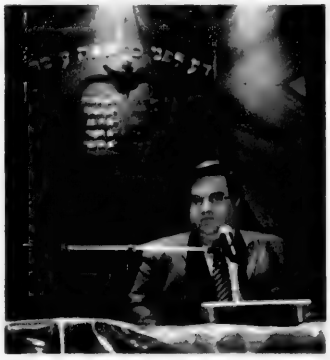
In a statement, CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel said: "These acts of terror represent not only an attack on the people of France or the targeting of the French Jewish community. They constitute an assault on fundamental western and democratic values, as illustrated by the attack on Charlie Hebdo.

"That said, we are acutely aware that today (Jan. 9) the hostage crisis unfolded in part in a Jewish neighbourhood at a Jewish business. History records that whenever Jews are attacked, as they have been in France for years, it is a harbinger of attacks targeting the broader society.

"France must do all it can to rebuff that threat, and we must all stand together with France in that battle."

B'nai Brith Canada urged French authorities to do more to protect the "beleaguered" Jewish community.

"The fact that the attackers chose to target a kosher supermarket right before the Sabbath at its peak hours underscores the high levels of animosity towards France's Jewish community," said CEO Michael Mostyn. "French authorities must confront the threat of jihadist radicalization head-on and redouble efforts to stem the rising tide of anti-Semitism in the country."



Mayor Denis Coderre at Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto president and CEO Morris Zbar said: "As an organization with a long and unbreakable bond with the people of Israel, we know all too well the pain and emotional trauma that results from such senseless and cowardly terror attacks...

"As Jewish Canadians, we stand together with our brothers and sisters of France, and extend to all the victims of this week's tragic events our deepest condolences, hopes and prayers."

Montreal's federation is spearheading an emergency fund to assist the French Jewish community. The most pressing need is safeguarding Jewish schools, synagogues and other institutions against further violence, and to provide immediate relief to victims of terror, Laxer and CEO Deborah Corber said in a letter to the community.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper condemned the attacks as "cowardly terrorist acts" and commended French authorities for swiftly ending the immediate terrorist threat.

"We stand with our allies in defiance of those who commit such barbaric acts and whose only aim is to usurp the rights of freedom-loving people everywhere, including the fundamental right of freedom of expression." ■

Near the supermarket site Friday, schools were put on lockdown or evacuated. Synagogue services in Paris were cancelled, reportedly for the first time since World War II.

The Hyper Cacher market is located on the easternmost edge of Paris, bordering Saint-Mandé – a heavily Jewish suburb with many kosher shops and restaurants. Just a quarter mile away from Hyper Cacher is the century-old Synagogue de Vincennes, which long has catered to the community's sizable Ashkenazi population. The synagogue is adjacent to another congregation, Beth Raphael, founded in 2005 to serve to the growing population of Jews of North African descent.

On Friday, Cours de Vincennes, usually a lively boulevard with a street market, was nearly abandoned. The only sound was that of police convoys heading to the Hyper Cacher nearby. Meanwhile, police ordered shops closed on the rue de Rosiers in Paris' Marais district, a Jewish area teeming with shoppers before Shabbat.

France announced Monday that it will increase security at Jewish institutions, including Jewish schools, with soldiers.

Nearly 5,000 security forces and police will be deployed to protect the country's 700 Jewish schools, Interior Minister Bernard Cazeneuves said in a meeting with parents at a Jewish school south of Paris near the Hyper Cacher attack.

The promise came a day after Hollande said in a meeting with French Jewish leaders in the wake of Hyper Cacher attack that France would move to protect synagogues and Jewish schools, including using the military.

On Sunday, nearly 500 people attended an aliyah fair organized before the Charlie Hebdo massacre by the Jewish Agency and attended by Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman, who was in Paris for Sunday's mass rally, and Jewish Agency chair Natan Sharansky.

The day before, in an interview in the Atlantic conducted before last week's violence, French Prime Minister Manuel Valls said the emancipation of the Jews was a "founding principle" of the republic and that if Jews were to leave, "The French Republic will be judged a failure." ■

Over one million people, including world leaders such as Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, gathered in Paris on Jan. 15, in tribute to the victims of last week's attacks. There were no speeches at the rally. Marchers carried signs in French reading "Je Suis Charlie," referring to the satirical magazine Charlie Hebdo where 12 staff members and security forces were killed Jan. 7. Other signs read in French "I am a Jew," representing the four men killed during an attack Jan. 9 on a kosher supermarket in a Paris suburb. A police officer was also killed by one of the attackers.

Order of Canada recognition 'particularly sweet,' Denis Brott says

Denis Brott

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Denis Brott, a renowned cellist who helped to establish Canada Council's Musical Instrument Bank, was driving when he got a call from the Governor General's office asking him if he would accept an appointment to the Order of Canada.

"It was a total surprise," Brott said of the phone call he got out of the blue at the end of last month.

Any Canadian can nominate a candidate for appointment to the Order of Canada, which recognizes outstanding achievement, dedication to the community and service to the nation, but information about nominations is kept confidential for reasons of privacy.

A native Montrealer, Brott, 64, said he was thrilled to accept the unexpected honour of being named a member of the Order of Canada.

"Recognition is not anything I have sought," he said. "I do what I do because I'm passionate about it, whether it's playing, teaching, or the instrument bank. Getting this recognition is particularly sweet because it's unsolicited and it comes from my country."

As a player, Brott is an international star who has toured the world. He came into prominence after winning the second prize in the Munich International Cello Competition in 1973 and has been mentored by some of the world's greatest cellists. He played with the Orford String Quartet for eight years, during which the quartet recorded 25 CDs, and he has made several solo recordings.

Brott teaches at the Conservatoire de musique du Québec, and he's the founder and artistic director of the Montreal Chamber Music Festival. He had a pivotal role in launching the Musical Instrument Bank in 1985.

The bank currently holds 22 historically significant violins, cellos and bows made by luthiers including Stradivari, Guarneri and Gagliano from 1600 to 1900, valued at about $40 million.

As a young cellist in his 30s, Brott saw the need for an instrument bank. "I needed a great cello," he said. "A great instrument is really your voice. It's a tool of your trade."

But a "great" cello can cost up to $1 million, which was beyond Brott's means. He wrote to several CEOs for help in creating an instrument bank and only one replied, William Turner of Consolidated-Bathurst, a newsprint company that has since been sold. Through Turner's connections in corporate Canada, they raised enough money, a quarter of a million dollars, to start the bank.

Brott is still active in acquiring instruments, which are left to the bank in people's wills or are purchased outright, which involves fundraising. He explained that you can buy excellent new pianos, clarinets and other orchestral instruments, but that's not the case with strings.

"With age, string instruments only get better," he said. "These instruments need to be played and should be played by great performers."

In 1995, Brott and his wife, Julie, founded the annual Montreal Chamber Music Festival "around their kitchen table," he said. This year, for the festival's 20th anniversary, about half of the instrument bank winners will be playing at the March to June event.

The 2015 edition of the festival commemorates "the end of the war, the end of the Holocaust and focuses on the resilience of the human spirit," Brott said.

It's an understatement to say that Brott was raised in a musical family. His father was the late violinist and composer Alexander Brott and his mother is the cellist Lotte Brott. Denis' brother is the conductor Boris Brott.

"My parents were totally devoted to their professions," Denis said. "Music was my parents' outlet and what they talked about around the dinner table." He said initially he took up piano to get his parents' approval. He switched to cello around the age of eight, eventually finding within himself a passion for music.

"I never question what I do. It's a force greater than myself," he said.

Brott is a member of Montreal's Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, where each year he plays Kol Nidre on cello. "It's a pleasure," he said, "and a poignant and meaningful work to play at that time of year." ■

Jewish film society opens with light Israeli Cupcakes

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Eytan Fox's musical comedy Cupcakes kicks off the 37th annual Toronto Jewish Film Society on Sunday, Jan. 18.

A group of friends and neighbours sit around a television to watch a talent competition called the Universong. The friends, five women and one man, root for the singer from their home country of Israel, hoping he belts it out better than the other countries' superstars. Disappointed by the Israeli's performance, the friends decide to cheer each other up by singing and strumming along to an original tune.

This early scene sets up Eytan Fox's colourful romantic comedy Cupcakes, which kicks off this year's Toronto Jewish Film Society (TJFS) on Sunday, Jan. 18. Like the characters from Cupcakes, film society members should find themselves rooting for a lot of Israeli talent this year.

The TJFS, North America's longest-running society of Jewish film, often showcases one or two titles from Israel in its annual program. In 2015, its 37th year, four of the eight selected films come from Israel or are Israeli co-productions.

"We take input from our members, and there's no question that Israeli film, in all of its diversity, is something that excites them," says Mark Clamen, chair of programming for the TJFS. "The film industry in Israel is thriving."

The four Israeli films showing at the Al Green Theatre in Toronto this year range from the upbeat musical Cupcakes to a powerful, personal documentary set in Germany.

In The Flat, director Arnon Goldfinger tries to make sense of a curious artifact he finds in his late grandmother's apartment, dating back to World War II. That acclaimed film will screen on Oct. 18.

The other Israeli titles include The Matchmaker, a coming-of-age drama set in Haifa during the late 1960s, which screens on Feb. 15. Meanwhile, festival favourite, Metallic Blues, a dark comedy about two Jewish men who face challenges while trying to sell a vintage car in Germany, deals with memory and the Holocaust. It will close the annual slate on Dec. 13.

Unlike the titles above, which focus on or deal with chapters from Jewish history, Cupcakes is a delightful slice of Israel's modern culture. You can get a sense of the film's chaotic flair from its North American title, as well as the Israeli moniker, which translates to "Bananas."

The romantic comedy is both funny and far-fetched. The film focuses on a circle of six friends from Tel Aviv who come together to watch a worldwide singing contest. After the male member of the group, Ofer (Ofer Shechter), records them singing an original tune, he sends it to the judges of the talent competition.

Miraculously, the friends are picked to represent Israel in the talent contest the following year. However, the instant celebrity and international pressure have their drawbacks.

Like the snack that gives the film its name, Cupcakes is light, sweet and filled with whirls of colour. In a nice, meta-touch, the actors in the main ensemble share their own names with those of their characters.

The film also has a lot of cheeky if familiar subplots. For instance, the openly gay Ofer worries that his exposure in the competition could drive away his closeted boyfriend. Meanwhile, Dana (Dana Ivgy, from Zero Motivation) is torn between following her dream to be a singer and moving forward with her political career.

With a scant 90-minute runtime, Fox's comedy zips along so quickly that few of the storylines get time to develop. Several of the conflicts are introduced quickly but are then solved rather hastily, without dealing with the issues for long.

Even though several scenes from Cupcakes are predictable, the film has an infectious energy from the beginning and never lets up. With swift one-liners, a terrific pop soundtrack (featuring songs in English and Hebrew) and an endearing message, the film's optimism and energy floats above some of the formulaic plotting.

Cupcakes is a delicious introduction to the TJFS program this year, one filled with terrific Israeli talent. Like past incarnations, this year's society will have a speaker curate each of the films and lead a discussion with the audience after the feature. ■

A subscription to the eight films is $101 for adults and seniors and $60 for those between the ages of 18 and 35. Individual tickets are also available at the theatre box office.

Cupcakes is one of a record four Israeli titles the society will screen this year.

CHEZ L'ARABE, BOOK OF SHORT STORIES BY MONTREAL AUTHOR MIREILLE SILCOFF

Recently published by the House of Anansi, Montreal author Mireille Silcoff's Chez L'arabe is a book of semi-autobiographical short stories, partly interconnected, about a narrator who becomes ill, as Silcoff did at age 32, with a neurological disorder that keeps her bedridden for years. "I wrote a lot of the book when I had to lie flat in bed because my brain had no suspension because I didn't have any spinal fluid," Silcoff recalls.

Chez L'arabe focuses on a woman in her mid-30s, trapped in her elegant Montreal townhouse and in her own mind and body. Feeling profoundly alone as she faces an increasingly indifferent husband and a volatile mother, she realizes that, even after she recovers, her life will never be the same.

Also, the University of Ottawa Press recently released The Collected Poems of Miriam Waddington in a two-volume set; and Cormorant Books has given us From Tolerance to Tyranny by Erna Paris, about Spain's descent, centuries ago, from a pluralistic, multicultural society to the least tolerant nation in Europe.

Singing at the Café Sztuka: Vera Gran's postwar trials

NORM RAVVIN

Cafés and nightclubs attain special resonance in times of great artistic or historical ferment. Jean-Paul Sartre's Les Deux Magots helped birth existentialism; the pre-World War I Café des Westens in Berlin offered a gathering place to avant-gardists like Kandinsky and Marc; in 1940s Harlem, Minton's Playhouse provided a venue for the new bebop developments in jazz. So it was that in the Warsaw Ghetto that the Café Sztuka gained a special role in the lives of the closed district's inhabitants.

In the spring of 1942, the newspaper Gazeta Zydowska described the Ghetto's "public for theatres and concerts." People went "above all, to the Sztuka. This was the most popular, most prestigious literary café, where the intelligentsia met. It was located at 2 Leszno Street. Many Polish-Jewish artists made appearances there, including the stars of prewar cabarets. In the Sztuka, Wiera Gran, Diana Blumenfeld, and Marysia Ajzensztadt sang. Wladyslaw Szpilman and Artur Goldfeder formed an excellent piano duet. In the Sztuka, Snow White was also staged for children.

The best known name among those listed is, of course, Szpilman, who survived the Ghetto, composed a memoir, and was offered far greater cultural familiarity by way of Roman Polanski's 2002 film The Pianist.

Wiera Gran, or Vera Gran as Agata Tuszynska spells the singer's name, was, like Szpilman, well-known to Poles before the war. Her earliest records were made in her teens under the name Sylvia Green, sometimes to an "orchestra of Hawaiian guitars." In 1937, she toured Poland as a celebrity and earned substantial fees "making short advertising films" for lotions, soaps and colognes. Though her musical career was a Polish-language phenomenon, in 1939 she made use of her childhood Yiddish alongside Ida Kaminska in The Homeless, said to be the last Yiddish film made in Poland before the outbreak of war.

Tuszynska's presentation of Gran's story makes quick work of the singer's prewar success. The story associated with Gran that drives the narrative of Vera Gran: The Accused derives from accusations, which first arose in the Ghetto but grew more ferocious after the war, that she used her popularity to create connections with the Gestapo.

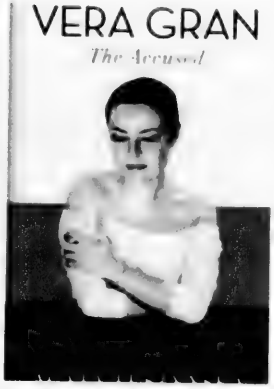
Drawn into this tangled tale is Szpilman, with whom Gran performed at the Café Sztuka. And so the book's lengthy self-description, which appears on its dustcover but not inside on its title page: "The Celebrated Singer of the Warsaw Ghetto, her Piano Accompanist Wladyslaw Szpilman, and a Meditation on the Nature of Collaboration."

Tuszynska befriended Gran in 2003, when she was living as a near recluse, largely forgotten, in a cluttered apartment in "an elegant neighbourhood of Paris, the 16th, around the Eiffel Tower… An old woman, not very tall, in a pink dressing gown, opened the door a crack."

They became an odd couple – meeting to record reminiscences and to struggle over how to understand the past – and Tuszynska stuck by her subject till the end, visiting her once when she moved to a home in the countryside dedicated to the care of Polish aged in France, and, finally, visiting her unmarked grave in a Paris suburb.

Tuszynska's approach to her subject is greatly influenced by her uncommon access to and intimacy with Gran. The portrait we receive is of an alternatively angry, depressed, paranoid, even psychotic solitary figure, whose memories, though in many ways revealing, are marked by a sense of having been wrongly accused of collaboration.

There is almost nothing in the historical record to support this accusation. Tuszynska's approach is to leave the question open, though she is ultimately on her subject's side. There is an extended discussion in Vera Gran: The Accused of the nature of collaboration in the Warsaw Ghetto. The proposal is made, loosely supported by a side comment in the diaries of Emanuel Ringelblum, that spending evenings in cafés, whether as a performer, impresario or audience member, while children starved, was unethical. But Ringelblum's criticism was aimed at the proprietors of certain cafés, who were in fact in contact with the Gestapo.



Vera Gran: The Accused
By Agata Tuszynska
Knopf

Tuszynska indulges the question of whether Gran might have considered that "practising her profession… could be inappropriate in this situation." This runs contrary to the majority of historical writing on the role of the arts and culture in the major Nazi ghettos. In her monumental history of the Warsaw Ghetto, Barbara Engelking asserts the role of art, which, before the war, was simply "normal," in the Ghetto became an "expression of dissent from the Nazi world order."

Something untold or untellable seems to lurk in connection with Szpilman. For Gran, he is the key bête noir in her downfall, a figure lionized after the war who, she says, compromised himself as a Jewish policeman in the Ghetto. After the war, when Gran begged him for work in his Polish radio concerts, he denied her, based upon accusations regarding her wartime behaviour. Others backed him up. But, like Szpilman, they seemed to have a less than straightforward reason for doing so – something in their own wartime activities that made them fearful, even vengeful.

This aspect of Gran's story remains shadowy. We understand that Gran was unduly accused, her career and possibly her sanity destroyed. The motives of her accusers remain vague, though Tuszynska does convey the complicated mindset of postwar survivors. Years after pointing the finger at Gran, key figures recant, while the damage continues as accusations reappear in Poland, in Israel and among survivors elsewhere.

Vera Gran: The Accused offers a counter-proposal to the notion that we can come to know another life, however public in its character, through careful research. The events of Gran's life were chaotic; many of those who knew her, including her family, were murdered by the Germans; her treatment after the war was bizarre and troubling, a kind of trap she could not escape from. But out of these loose ends Tuszynska weaves a revealing narrative of Polish-Jewish identity, wartime experience, and, more importantly, the confusions and deceits lurking in postwar Holocaust response. ■

Hopefuls audition for JAM's talent show

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Tensions ran high in a small upstairs room at the Prosserman JCC on Jan. 8, as eight brave souls auditioned before a panel of judges for a spot in Jewish and Modern (JAM)'s upcoming talent show Jewish & Talented.

The show, which will be held Feb. 12 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, is a brand new initiative for JAM, a volunteer-run, not-for-profit group focused on strengthening Toronto's Jewish Russian-speaking and Russian-Israeli community through social and educational events – typically for young professionals aged 22 to 40.

"We have so much talent in our community," said Tanya Grabarnik, one of the judges and an event co-ordinator at JAM, who said she first pitched the idea of a talent show to fellow JAM organizers back in April. "People often don't have a place to show their talents, to show what they've got. That's exactly why we're doing this."

The eight auditioning that night, whose talents ran the gamut from singing to magic tricks to impressions, were, along with 21 people who submitted video audition clips, vying for one of the coveted 12 spots at the show.

The sense of nervousness in the room was palpable, but despite the obvious sense of competition, a spirit of camaraderie seemed to prevail among the contestants. As they took turns facing the panel to showcase their talent, those waiting gathered in the hallway outside and proceeded to engage in a companionable sing-a-long.

The strains of Leonard Cohen's Hallelujah could be heard seeping into the closed audition room, as individuals mostly in their early 20s – several from Israel or of descent from the former Soviet Union – eagerly attempted to woo the judges.

Sasha Liknaitzky, 20, a singer-songwriter who, accompanying herself on guitar, performed a song by the group Kodaline as well as one of her own songs, spoke graciously of the competition.

"It seems like everyone's got different kinds of talents," she said. "But, at the end of the day, we all love the same things: music, the same TV shows...we were all totally nerding out!"

Dan Fridmar, 20, born in Israel to a Russian family, performed a rendition, in Russian of poems by Russian poets Alexander Pushkin and Sergei Yesenin. "I'm doing this because I love performing," he said. "Whoever gets it, as long as there are amazing people performing – that's great," he said.

Leah Bassett, who had the judges chuckling with her comedic characterization of a vain and buxom Mexican conchita, said, "There's not really a lot of opportunities for me to utilize my skills, or gifts. I thought this would be a great opportunity."

Zack Liknaitzky, 24, Sasha's brother, performed a series of impressions. "Everyone else was busy singing," he said. "I was like, 'Whoo, I'm in a different category!'"

Judges Grabarnik, Ilia Dobkin and Oren Kats have been promoting the show via Facebook and word of mouth, and, with other organizers, will select the 12 talent show acts.

Dobkin stressed that the show, which they hope will become an annual event, is meant to be a community affair, and their aim is for the audience to include a broader age demographic than the usual bracket JAM targets.

"I think Jews in general are very talented people," he said.

Before the show, which will be judged by several members of the community involved in the arts (the complete roster of judges is still being determined), there will be a showcase of visual art made by members of the community.

"I know personally how you want to show what you can do and share it with your community," Grabarnik, who is herself a circus performer, said. "When you enjoy doing something, that comes through in the performance. It brings out joy, pleasure and happiness and everyone is united in that experience. It's really important for people to have opportunities to go to shows and to perform."

JAM's goal is to sell 180 tickets for the Feb. 12 show, which will begin with a reception at 7 p.m. The talent show will start at 8 p.m. ■

Tickets cost $25, and can be purchased online at www.ticketmaster.ca.

Ask Ella

Responsibility = accountability and independence

Ella Burakowski

Dear Ella,

It was mahj night at Carol's when her daughter walked in with two huge bags and announced, "Here is our laundry." Carol looked embarrassed and immediately made an excuse: "The kids work so hard." We looked at each other, and after full confessions were over, we realized we are all somewhat responsible for not allowing our kids to take responsibility for their own lives. We laughed and blew it off, but I'm not sure this is funny. Is this typical or are the four of us just total patsies?

Overindulgent Parents

Dear Overindulgent Parents,

You are not alone. It seems that more and more parents feel it's okay to step into their children's lives and "help." If your kids are old enough to be out on their own, you must support their independence. Empower them by allowing them to prioritize – pay their own bills, do their own laundry, buy their own groceries, get their own car repairs, etc. I promise you they will not go to work with dirty clothes, they will not starve, their electricity will not get cut off.

If you are really honest with yourselves, you will admit that you are not doing these things because you don't have confidence in your children. Carol is doing her daughter's laundry because it's an excuse to see her. "Helping" is a way to stay connected and not give up total control.

It's not the kids having problems, it's the parents not being able to let go. It's a passive way to lure your kids home, and it makes you feel useful. You can tell yourself you are not doing any harm, but you are giving your kids a warped sense of what it means to stand on their own two feet. Stop keeping them dependent on you.

They know you love them and you will never let harm come to them, but are you really helping? Will they have enough life experience to make important decisions without you? Will you let them do this without interfering?

Allow them to stumble and fix their own problems: they will feel accomplished and empowered because they were able to work out a solution all on their own. Let them be responsible for their own time management, household budgets and chores. It's a good start.

Shift your relationship into the next gear. If you want to see them, invite them over for dinner, sans laundry. Leave your chequebook locked away and those extra few dollars in your pocket and enjoy a nice, adult evening with your kids.

Dear Ella,

My friend Barb's husband passed away a few months ago and she is like a lost sheep. Allen took care of all the bills, repairs, cars, insurance, investments – everything. Barb was never involved, and now that some time has passed, she is dealing with the reality of not knowing how to run her life.

I want to help her, but this was a wake-up call for me too, as my husband also handles everything. What can I do to help her and myself?

Financial Responsibility

Dear Financial Responsibility,

Losing a partner is like losing a big piece of yourself. There is no getting around that! Barb has to allow herself the time to find her new "normal."

The practical part of finances can be an overwhelming burden, especially while someone is grieving. If possible, Barb should hire a financial adviser to educate her and organize her financial obligations.

Another alternative would be to have a relative or close friend help and teach Barb about banking, paying bills, changing billing names and finding out which bills are paid automatically, online or by cheque.

There are many documents that need to be gathered besides the bills, such as bank statements, insurance policies, tax returns, loans or mortgages, car info and investment info, just to name a few.

Life is complicated, but death can be more complicated, especially if you have not dealt with day-to-day responsibilities. It's too late for Barb, but it's not too late for you. Learn how to run your own financial affairs now. It's much easier when it's your choice rather than when it's forced on you. ■

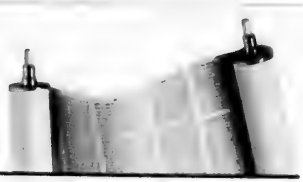
Va'era | Exodus 6:2 - 9:35



Rabbi Ilan Acoca says anger isn't the answer, and the proof can be found in the plague of the frogs
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl argues our understanding of the Divine is always changing
Rabbi Catharine Clark highlights an example of justice delivered exactly on target

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

The second plague to befall Egypt was the plague of frogs.

The Torah (Shmot 8:2) says that at the outset, HaShem brought upon the Egyptians one huge frog.

Rashi quotes the Talmud in Sanhedrin 67b that when the Egyptians began hitting the frog in anger and frustration, it multiplied again and again, until frogs were everywhere.

Rabbi Yaakov Kanievsky asks the obvious question: why didn't they stop hitting it when they saw the results of their actions?

He answers with a very profound truth about human nature. When a person is angry and does something in anger, although he sees that no good will come out of it, he can't help himself. His anger carries him further to do what he knows intellectually he will regret later on.

How often do we get into an argument and begin saying things we know we will have to take back?

At the time, we feel that we just "have to" do this, regardless of the consequences. Later on we realize how foolish we were and wish it never happened.

We should realize that the majority of the time, getting angry does more harm than good. Although the rabbis tell us that there are certain times we are allowed to act angry if we are truly calm inside and there is good reason for it, nevertheless, experience has shown that this is difficult to rely upon.

Next time we think about losing our temper, let's remember the big Egyptian frog and think about the consequences.

This will help us find alternatives to solve our problems without losing our temper. ■

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

At the beginning of Va'era, God appears to Moses, and the text says, "Elokim spoke to Moshe and said to him, 'I am Y-H-V-H. I appeared to Avraham, Yitzhak, and Yaakov as K'El Shad-dai, but I did not make Myself known to them by My Name Y-H-V-H (Exodus 6:2-3). How is this possible? We know that many times in Genesis, God is referred to as Y-H-V-H!

Academic biblical scholars understand these verses to indicate that there were different source traditions that were brought together to become the Torah. The tradition represented here had part of the Genesis narratives, but not the one that used the name Y-H-V-H. One take-away is that the Torah has different strands, each recounting partial experiences of the divine message. We also have only a partial perspective and depend on what has been transmitted to us by earlier generations and the insights of others around us to develop a deeper and broader spiritual outlook.

The comments of classical rabbinic scholars offer other important lessons. Rashi notes that God did not demonstrate to the ancestors the full capacity of Y-H-V-H to fulfil divine promises. Rashi's grandson, Rashbam, suggests that even though God used a variety of names in Genesis for the Divine, only with Moses will the actualization of God's names attain completion. Ibn Ezra and Ramban, not usually in agreement, both propose that the complete significance of the four-letter name of the Holy One was not understood by the ancestors.

Perhaps the essence of the name Y-H-V-H, which is related to the name-phrase "I shall be," is intended to text a message that God is always "becoming." In every generation, we discover new understandings of the Divine. Parents often teach children about God, but sometimes children open our eyes to disclose new wonders – about the world, about life, about God. ■

In the Bible, justice often is exacted in a manner that appears overbroad by modern standards, sweeping into destruction the innocent along with the guilty. In this week's parshah, however, justice is delivered exactly on target.

In the lead-up to the plague of frogs, God tells Moses to go before Pharaoh and threaten that the Nile will swarm with frogs, saying to the Egyptian leader, "They shall come up and enter your house, your bedchamber and your bed, the house of your servants and your people." Rashi asks why the Torah states "your house," and only afterward, "the house of your servants."

Rashi's answer refers to the previous parshah, in which Pharaoh instigates the oppression of the Israelites. In Parshat Shmot, it is Pharaoh who claims that the Israelites have become too numerous and must be enslaved lest they join Egypt's enemies and rise up against Pharaoh. Thus begins the Egyptian program of forced labour.

According to Rashi, because Pharaoh implemented the oppression of the Israelites and only then did other Egyptians join him in his ruthless policy, Pharaoh is appropriately punished first by the plague of frogs. The frogs will infest his home before they infest the home of his servants.

What a contrast to the modern world. When a foreign state violates international law and sanctions are imposed, the poor and powerless suffer before the leader who can and should reform the country's actions. Closer to home, when our elected leaders act contrary to the public good by failing to fund education or expand public transportation, for instance, it is the common person, not the government official, who sends her children to subpar schools or endures an arduous commute.

When you crave beef...

EILEEN GOLTZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Like many, my family has cut down on red meat consumption. However, every now and then, the need for beef overcomes my self-discipline, I give in to my craving and head right for the ribs. No, I'm not talking about putting them in a cholent, but beef ribs as a stand-alone main course. Typically, I make them in a crock pot and serve them for Shabbat lunch on a cold day.

There are two kind beef ribs available in most grocery stores or butcher shops, back ribs and short ribs. Easy to remember which is which: the back ribs are big and the meat is between the rib, and the short ribs are, well, short and the meat is on top. Most people prefer back ribs for the barbecue and the short ribs for the oven or crock pot.

Short ribs are my go-to cut for a longer, slower, make ahead in the morning, serve in the evening meal. I prefer the bone in short rib – it seems to have a deeper flavour – but the boneless cut is just fine. When you're looking for good ribs, there should be a nice layer of fat running through the muscle.

I don't always use a recipe when I'm making my short ribs. I braise them in a little oil (salt and pepper them first, then sear/brown the outside of the ribs in a pan over a high heat). I like them kinda charred a bit on the edges. Pull the ribs out of the pan, deglaze the pan and then pour the sauce or mixture of ingredients over the ribs, cover and cook for 4 to 8 hours on medium in a crock pot or 325 in the oven, depending on how many ribs and how much sauce, and falling off the ribs meat that is delicious.

I typically use about 1/2 to a pound of ribs per person (the men in my life like lots of ribs). I've used wine, broth, beer and lots of other "stuff" depending on my mood (and what's in my pantry). Fresh herbs and vegetables add to fun. You should always cover the ribs when cooking. You can, of course, use rubs for seasoning and serve them with rice or potatoes or even noodles. I have a friend who swears that there is nothing like a crispy slice of polenta with short ribs, but I say it doesn't matter what you serve them with, they truly are wonderful just by themselves. Oh, and they're even more amazing a day or so later reheated.

Sesame Short Ribs With Peppers

- ❑ 1/2 cup soy sauce
- ❑ 1/3 cup brown sugar
- ❑ 1/4 cup rice vinegar
- ❑ 2 tsp. minced garlic
- ❑ 1 tsp. dried ginger
- ❑ 2 red bell pepper, chopped
- ❑ 5 lb. short ribs
- ❑ 1 tbsp. cornstarch
- ❑ 2 tbsp. sesame oil
- ❑ 1 red onion, chopped to bite sized pieces
- ❑ toasted sesame seeds

Preheat the oven to broil. Place the ribs on a broiler pan and drizzle the sesame oil over the top of the ribs. Broil for 3 minutes on each side. In a large crock pot, combine the soy sauce, sugar, vinegar, garlic and ginger. Mix to combine. Add the ribs and mix to coat.

Cook for 5 to 8 hours, depending on whether you're cooking on medium or high. The meat should be falling off the bone. I serve these ribs with the toasted sesame seeds over fried rice. Serves 5 to 6.

Classic Short Ribs

- ❑ 1 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper
- ❑ 4 lb. short ribs
- ❑ 1 onion, chopped
- ❑ 1 tbsp. minced garlic
- ❑ 1/2 cup red wine
- ❑ 2 cups beef broth
- ❑ 2 tbsp. soy sauce
- ❑ 1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
- ❑ 2 tbsp. brown sugar
- ❑ 2 bay leaves

Preheat oven to 325. Heat the oil, over a cook top, in a large roasting pan or Dutch oven. Season the ribs with salt and pepper, then sear the outsides of the ribs in the hot oil for 4 to 5 minutes. Add the onions and garlic. Reduce the heat to medium and cook, stirring occasionally, until all sides of the ribs are seared and the vegetables are soft but not mushy. Add the wine and bring the mixture to a boil. Simmer for 2 minutes, then add the broth, soy sauce, vinegar, brown sugar and bay leaves. Bring the mixture back to a boil, cover and cook in the oven (or if using a crock pot pour everything into the crock pot) for 3 hours (mix once or twice if you like). To serve, discard the bay leaf and season with salt and pepper to taste. Serves 4. This is great with mashed or baked potatoes.

Short Ribs In Beer

- ❑ 6 lb. beef short ribs
- ❑ salt and pepper, to taste
- ❑ 3 tbsp. oil
- ❑ 2 onions, diced
- ❑ 3 carrots, diced
- ❑ 4 celery stalks, diced
- ❑ 2 tbsp. minced garlic
- ❑ 2 cups dark beer
- ❑ 2 tbsp. ketchup

Preheat oven to broil. Season the ribs with salt and pepper. Place the onions on the bottom of a roasting pan and place the ribs on top. Drizzle the oil over the top of the ribs. Broil the ribs for 3 minutes on each side. Place the ribs, minced garlic and onions into a crock pot or Dutch oven if you're cooking this in the oven (cover the Dutch oven with a lid or foil). Spoon the ketchup over the ribs, then layer the carrots and celery over the top of the ribs. Pour the beer over the top of the ribs. Cover and cook for 4 hours at 325 in the oven or 6 hours on high in the crock pot.

To serve, remove the ribs to a serving plate. Using a food processor or immersion blender process the sauce until smooth. Season with salt and pepper. Serves 6 to 8.

Uzi Landau: Seeking to boost travel to Israel

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Uzi Landau has served in the Israeli cabinet in a number of roles over the years, including as minister of internal security, and minister of energy and water. As a member of the Yisrael Beitenu party, he currently serves as the country's minister of tourism. Landau, who was a member of the Likud party for many years, was in Toronto last month where he met with local Jewish community leaders at a breakfast organized by the Israel Government Tourist Office jointly with the Consulate General of Israel. He spoke with The CJN.

Uzi Landau

What is the purpose of your trip to Toronto?
The purpose of the trip is to boost up tourism, to put it back on the normal trend of a constant increase. That used to be the trend over the past few years, and it was disrupted during the times of the terror activities and the shelling and launching of rockets from Gaza by the Hamas terror organization.

This has always affected us. What comes out as a perception for those who see the BBC or CNN is that Israel is a war zone – that people are shooting on street corners. We want to reconnect to our base communities, people who will understand that Israel is safe. That the perception is wrong.

Second, we think it would be good to show solidarity against the BDS (boycott, divestment and sanctions) campaign abroad. Anti-Semitism is on the increase.

This meeting today is to call on this informed Jewish community to go on solidarity missions, to go on vacations combined with a sense of purpose, to come to Israel to bring the Jewish community to stand up with the Jewish state.

Travel to Israel dropped after Operation Protective Edge. How badly has tourism been affected?
On the average, there has been a decrease, since July, of between 20 and 30 per cent, give or take in different countries. Interestingly, from the United States, it continues to go up. I was quite surprised by that.

Again, we do see a reaction by people that's normal, which makes sense. Why should we go to a place that is perceived to be unsafe? What I want to say is that once people come, leaders of the community, writers in newspapers, TV stars and others who have many followers on Twitter and Facebook, if they come, they can go safely from Tel Aviv and Jerusalem to the Dead Sea. They can float in the Dead Sea. They can walk 24 hours a day in Tel Aviv, go to restaurants, culinary centres, boutique wineries, go to art shops and jewelry shops in Jaffa. People feel safe.

In Israel, parents send even their first graders, unescorted, to school. That's what's happening in our country.

If the numbers from the United States are not down, where have you noticed a drop off?
Much of the loss was in western Europe.

Did the synagogue attack in Jerusalem contribute to the drop in tourism?
Not this time. But if such things continue, obviously it will have some effect. Until now, over the past couple of months after Operation Protective Edge, despite all the extremists who have tried to add terror activities in Judea and Samaria and Jerusalem, even with all the problems we had, Jerusalem is a safe place. The only problem we had was with perception, because when you get this event and people zoom in on the area of killings, you get the feeling that everything is like that.

Naomi Shemer, a great poet, said "Thank God the BBC weren't operating with their cameras in the battle between David and Goliath. If they were, the camera would zoom on the forehead of Goliath, with the stone sunk deep in his forehead, and until today, everybody would be sure that David was the villain and that poor Goliath was killed."

There were some rockets that landed near Ben-Gurion International Airport during Operation Protective Edge. Did that affect tourism to Israel?
It did. The [rockets] didn't hit the area of Ben-Gurion International Airport. The airport continued to be protected, and it's the safest in the world. What made the problem was the Federal Aviation Authority (FAA) directive to all American airlines to ban their flights to Israel. It was difficult for me to understand the source for that. The fact of the matter is that the FAA itself backtracked on its decision within 36 hours and all the major airlines that discontinued their flights came back to fly.

May I add that British Airways, Iberia, Aeroflot, Ukrainian International Airline continued to fly. Of course El Al continued to fly. It is our assumption that this decision caused many people to cancel their reservations.

Was tourism a growing industry before Operation Protective Edge?
Absolutely. Until July, for the third consecutive year, tourism was on a constant increase. Until July, it was eight per cent higher compared to [the same period in] 2013. That was again a record figure compared to 2012. Now we're trying to get back on track.

How has that drop in the number of visitors affected the Israeli economy overall?
In our assessment, it cost us about two billion Israeli shekels, which is roughly $600 million American dollars. And what we're now trying to do is invigorate tourism towards the end of winter and spring.

Can you point to a drop in employment or less tax revenue for the Israeli government as a result of this drop in tourism?
It's difficult for me to say that. This time, unlike on previous occasions, the war in Lebanon, things that took place in the past, the government arrived at a resolution that supports this industry with a figure of half a billion Israeli shekels. This is extraordinary. In previous times, it was about one-third of that. Our industry has to continue and function until it again will start to pick up. We hope it will be soon.

Is the situation today worse for the tourism industry than it was after the war in Lebanon or other Gaza wars?
No. There were models, characteristics that took place after the war in Lebanon (2006) and Operation Pillar of Defence (2012). We believe it will be similar to Pillar of Defence. It took six to eight months before the industry came back and functioned normally.

Has the BDS campaign had much of an impact?
I don't think economically it has had much of an impact. The problem with the BDS is that it makes legitimate the very debate whether the Jewish People has a right to their home. Do you know of any other nation in the world that is having this kind of a debate? Have you heard whether or not Canada has a right to exist? Does the United States have a right to exist? Is France a legitimate country? Why do you raise this issue about us?

Obviously, for us, this is done to undermine the right of the Jewish People to have a state of its own, like any other normal country in the world. This is what underlies all the BDS, these are old anti-Semitic sentiments that are surfacing under the pretext of what Israel does.

Who will you be meeting other than the Jewish community?
With Christian communities too. We had a meeting yesterday with Pastor Rondo Thomas [of the Toronto Christian Centre]. We're going to meet tonight with Christian leaders, including Thomas Cardinal Collins of Toronto. By the way, the safest place for an Arab in the Middle East today is in Israel. When it comes to Christians, they are the minority that suffers the most in the Middle East. There are dwindling numbers in Egypt, Lebanon – you name it. In Israel, the number of Christians is on the increase. And you know why? Because Israel is a democracy and we are proud to preserve all the rights of our minorities.

Has the number of people coming from Canada remained stable? Is that why you're visiting the Christian communities, because they've stopped coming?
I'm coming to [see] everybody. I also speak to people, and they tell me there has been a problem with the packages and reservations made for the future. Which means people are taking their time, they are looking around and seeing if it's safe to go. We do bring people to Israel to see that it is safe.

Do you have a marketing budget for Canada?
We're going to focus our marketing on our base groups first. We are going to speak to those who have in the past been very friendly to Israel and from there, we are going to continue and see how we reach out to new communities.

Now, and for the last few years, there has been a trend of FITs, free independent travellers, who already have different foci than they used to have. But we are focusing on our base communities for now. [Later] we will extend our efforts to new communities.

People say that the costs of accommodations in Israel are too high, especially now when hotels are not full. What can the government of Israel do about that?
The government of Israel is not going to intervene in the market. We are an open economy. But I guess when tourism comes down, then this will bring down prices. When tourism starts again the prices will come up. But rooms today are empty and people can find today a room in a hotel that is suitable to their needs. ■

Some academic boycotts are not such a bad thing

Backstory

MICHAEL BROWN

In 1936, the University of Heidelberg, one of the most illustrious universities in Europe and perhaps the world, was celebrating its 550th anniversary. The occasion was to be commemorated with pageantry and academic gatherings.

Jewish students had fared well in German universities in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Unlike Russia, the United States, and Canada, quotas on Jewish students were not much in evidence in Germany. Chaim Weizmann, Israel's first president, studied there; Nehama and Yeshayahu Leibovitz earned their doctorates there. Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik received his doctorate in Berlin just six weeks before Hitler became chancellor. Judah Magnes, the American-born Reform rabbi who served as the first chancellor of the Hebrew University, held a doctorate from Heidelberg.

But by 1936, the Nazis had been in power for three years. Just three months into their rule, they had shown their contempt for learning by burning tens of thousands of books by Jews and other "undesirables." Faculty members who were Jews or known leftists had been dismissed, and Jewish students, even those born in Germany, were no longer admitted. The number of women students was considerably reduced. In Heidelberg, the university rector, Wilhelm Groh, always came to campus in his SA uniform.

University education all over Germany had been radically altered and politicized. "Unreliable" professors had been replaced in many cases by men who were underqualified but ideologically acceptable to the ruling party. Non-academic activities, such as para-military training and lectures on Nazi ideology and the "science" of racism, as well as "voluntary" agricultural labour, were now compulsory university activities. Freedom of speech was no longer possible.

Many invitees to the Heidelberg anniversary were wary of toasting any institution in Nazi Germany. As it turned out, the Heidelberg festivities included parades of faculty and students in their various Nazi uniforms. One of the main speakers was Dr. Josef Goebbels, the minister of propaganda.

Anticipating all this, most British universities boycotted the events in Heidelberg and forthrightly told their German colleagues why. By contrast, some of the most prestigious U.S. universities accepted the invitation – Yale, for example, and Harvard, where the student newspaper, The Crimson, lobbied for an official delegation. At Columbia, the student paper, The Spectator, with many Jews on staff, lobbied against any official participation, and there were violent protests in support of that position. Princeton was not invited, probably because it had given sanctuary to Albert Einstein.

Canadians were torn between the British and U.S. positions. At the University of Toronto, the president, Rev. H.J. Cody, was inclined to participate in the belief that a refusal because of the Nazis' "oppression of minorities and their oppressive educational policy" would not be justified, that "Heidelberg's great work in the past is [reason] enough to honour her." In the end, however, he wrote to the Germans, that it "is not possible for this university to send a delegate."

Dalhousie's president, Carleton Stanley, was more forthright. He "acknowledged the great and glorious history of Heidelberg," and noted that in general, "Canadian universities are most desirous of promoting friendly relations with the academic life of other countries – relations in which the last war made so sad a break." It is, however, "impossible for us to participate in any university celebrations in Germany under the present regime." In other words, an academic boycott for political reasons.

McGill's principal, Arthur Eustace Morgan, minced no words. He had forbidden student exchanges with Nazi Germany and refused to take part in German-sponsored events in Canada. Not only did he turn down the invitation to the festivities, he even refused to attend a conference scheduled in Heidelberg before the anniversary chaired by an old friend from Britain. "I regret," he wrote to a friend and colleague, "that I feel unable to accept any invitation at the moment to attend a meeting to be held in a German university."

Most CJN readers, I'm sure, would agree with that academic boycott. Academic boycotts are not "in principle" illegitimate, then. What needs to be discussed in the case of any boycott is the particular issue at hand. ■

Communing with God has health benefits, and Woody branches out

Going to shul is good for you

Regular shul attendance may make you healthier, regardless of denomination, says a new study of five large U.S. Jewish communities by Baylor University's Institute for Studies of Religion. The study found that "adults who affiliate with a Jewish religious denomination and attend synagogue report significantly better health than secular or non-practising Jews," Jeff Levin, director of the institute's program on religion and population health, said last week. The study, based on data from community surveys in Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston and New York in the 2000s, was published in January's Journal of Religion and Health. Will a future study look at shul politics and migraines?

Filmmaker to make his first TV series

At the ripe old age of 79, Woody Allen is set to write and direct his first TV series, an Internet-only show for Amazon. Amazon, the online purveyor of virtually everything, is relatively new to original programming, but its Transparent won best comedy TV series at the Golden Globes this month. It has ordered a full season of Allen's as-of-yet unnamed project without even seeing a pilot. Amazon Studios vice-president Roy Price said the Internet behemoth "couldn't be more excited to premiere [Allen's] first TV series," to which the venerable Brooklyn-born filmmaker replied: "I don't know how I got into this. I have no ideas, and I'm not sure where to begin. My guess is that Roy Price will regret this."

Will Amazon regret this?

Jewish boy's parents file lawsuit

The family of a Jewish boy killed in the 2012 Sandy Hook Elementary School massacre is one of two families suing Newtown, Conn., and its school board for alleged lax security. The parents of Noah Pozner, 6, as well the parents of another boy, filed the lawsuit last month. It reportedly is seeking more than $15,000 in damages, as is standard. According to the suit, the school board and the town were negligent in not having a more secure entranceway and parking lot. Twenty children and six school employees were killed in the massacre. ■

Interdating opposed

I applaud Rabbi Jarrod Grover's stand on rejecting United Synagogue Youth's interdating policy change ("Opinions vary on USY interdating policy change," Jan. 8).

Why do we need to become even more compromising when intermarriage is spiralling out of control? Do we really want to send the message that interdating is acceptable?

With Jewish continuity already threatened, I fear the outcome of the next Pew study and am puzzled by the apathy of the Jewish community and its leaders.

The exodus is unique

In an interview about the movie Exodus: Gods and Kings (Dec. 25), Rabbi David Baron cited the metamorphosis of national character as a universal theme. "It's a question that all nations who've gone through and experienced exile and return go through. So, we can look at the experiences of many great nations in this regard," he said.

I wonder if Rabbi Baron could name one great nation, other than Israel, that has experienced exile and return? The French? The Chinese? The Russians? I'm afraid there are none. Interestingly, in the Torah itself, the audacious claim is made that nothing like the Exodus had ever happened to any other people, nor would it ever occur. Indeed, that claim has held true.

Perhaps Rabbi Baron should consult with the Torah, or a history book, before consulting for his Hollywood friends.

Defining who is a Jew

As a rabbi who assists many wonderful individuals seeking to convert, I believe letter writer Michael Diamond's point of view ("The politics of conversion," Jan. 15) is lacking. To classify the "few ideologues" as playing God actually misses the point and, I believe, takes us even further from any form of mutual respect.

Perhaps one could disagree with the traditions and beliefs of Orthodoxy, but if we do not have a uniform acceptance of who is a Jew and what constitutes a convert, then not only do we create chaos, we end up with no definition at all. The Orthodox rabbis follow the beliefs and traditions that have been with us for the past 3,000 years. Do they not have a right to follow those beliefs when asked to convert or recognize someone as a Jew?

I would certainly expect that liberal rabbis would have their own definition of who is a Jew. I can disagree with it, but it certainly must exist.

If there are legal definitions of an adult, a national definition of a Canadian citizen, religious definition of a Christian, why would someone fault us in expecting a definition of who is a Jew and expecting that it would be followed, at least by those who subscribe to it?

To allow every person to self-define themselves as being Jewish or not is actually, in my opinion, bad for the long-term health of the Jewish People. No one would really know who among us is actually a Jewish person, since there is no definition, or at most a totally fluid definition.

Canada is unquestionably a pluralistic society. However, religion at its best can not truly be pluralistic. We have to be tolerant of the beliefs of others with an expectation that others are equally respectful and tolerant of ours. To have a "belief of many truths," the definition of pluralism, simply does not work with religion. Tolerance, however, something that is sadly lacking among our own people, is something we all should strive for.

To dismiss rabbinic leaders as "playing God" is a lack of tolerance. Such a lack of tolerance, a lack of mutual respect, is unquestionably a serious problem.

The rabbis I know who take the time, care and interest to assist people in finding their way to Judaism as converts have a right to define who, what and how they do so based on the beliefs they have held for millennia.

To attack the ability of those rabbis to operate based on the beliefs they adhere to and to belittle them by inferring that they see themselves as God truly shows a lack of understanding and a lack of tolerance.

If we want to have a unified Jewish People, it is not by getting rid of definitions or making light of age-old beliefs. Rather, it is by showing respect and care for other Jews, regardless of their Jewish practice or lack thereof.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Superstition ain't the way

But where's the balance between our brains, which crave an ordered view of Judaism, and our souls, which seek a sense of meaning that rationalism can't always provide?

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LIBRARY, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Finegold: I have always had a hard time with some of the more superstitious aspects of Judaism. Stories of demons in the Talmud and other practices that seem antiquated – not to mention on shaky halachic footing – are difficult for me to incorporate into my daily practice.

For example, the custom of washing one's fingers upon waking to cleanse them of evil spirits is a custom I struggle with. Another example is the prohibition against placing meat and fish on the same plate for fear of causing oneself bodily harm. How do you reconcile these ideas with your understanding of Judaism in the 21st century?

Rabbi Scheim: Your question reminded me of a volume in my library that I took off the shelf this morning for the first time in decades. The book, Kedushat Levi, is the Torah commentary of Rabbi Levi Yitzchak of Berdichev.

The title page suggests the book be placed in every Jewish home, because its very presence will protect all members of the household from evil. I am proud to own the commentary of such an inspirational rabbinic giant, but have never taken its insurance policy proviso very seriously.

Similarly, I view mezuzot as reminders of our mitzvah responsibilities and of our mandate to transmit Jewish learning and practice to future generations. I resist the popular tendency to view the mezuzah as an amulet, providing household protection, and its theologically problematic obverse – that an unkosher mezuzah may lead to tragedy.

I fear that superstition can lead to a very unbecoming depiction of the Almighty as One who would invoke terrible punishment for relatively minor ritual infractions.

Rabbi Finegold: I wonder if we can eliminate all superstition from our religious practice, and whether that may not be what we want entirely. While I struggle with certain practices and customs that balance between Halachah and minhag – do you think anyone will deny me an aliyah because I do not wash the spiritual impurities from my nails in the morning? – I do validate that this structured approach of living does indeed offer many people value.

In fact, I often look at hyper-rationalist Jews and note their lack of awe and wonder toward the Divine. I see it often enough to come to the conclusion that some form of mysticism is needed in Judaism. The question then becomes how do we balance between our brains, which crave an ordered view of Judaism, and our souls, which want to be inspired and imbued with a sense of meaning that the Maimonidean rationalism does not always provide.

Don't get me wrong, I, too, share your mezuzah values, but I'm not sure how to present a Judaism that no longer speaks of angels and demons, but that also provides the framework to look out the window in the morning and see the sunrise as just one of the many miracles that God gives us daily.

Rabbi Scheim: Agreed. A balance is needed between pure rationalism and a religious sensitivity to the fears and emotional challenges that are so much a part of the human experience.

My teacher, the late Rabbi Max Kadushin, spoke of the "indeterminacy of belief," whereby we have multiple explanations for events and practices, meeting the diverse needs of the community. Thus, for some, a glass is broken under the chupah to remind us of the destruction of Jerusalem, while for others, it was intended to confuse the demons who would lurk at happy (and sad) occasions.

Similarly, for some, a pregnant woman should not enter a cemetery where the demons present could harm the fetus, while for others, there is no restriction other than respecting elderly family members holding to the superstition, or concern for the emotional and physical health of the mother-to-be.

Even though I tend toward the rational approach and away from superstition, I hold on to a small measure of fear and uncertainty, believing that it's always religiously sound not to be too sure of oneself. ■

Free speech can be discomforting

Last Thursday, on Jan. 15, Jerry Reddick, a Haligonian hotdog vendor known as the "Dawgfather," caused a stir when he issued a string of anti-Semitic tweets.

"Hitler asked his people, 'How do you like your Jews'? Well done with a bagel and a kosher pickle. Freedom of speech goes both ways," one read. Another said, "What do you call a Jew sitting in one of Hitler's ovens? Toast, because they're cooked. Freedom of speech goes both ways!" There were more, including callous references to the victims of the 9/11 attack in New York City, and by the end of the day police in Halifax were investigating the Dawgfather for hate speech (see page 24).

In Paris a day earlier, police detained Dieudonné M'bala M'bala, the French comedian infamous for propagating the quenelle, a hand gesture that evokes the Nazi salute and has been adopted by anti-Semites around the world. Dieudonné was charged with inciting hatred after writing on Facebook, "Je me sens Charlie Coulibaly" ("I'm feeling like Charlie Coulibaly"), a riff on the "Je suis Charlie" expression popularized in the wake of the deadly attack on French magazine Charlie Hebdo, but with a sinister message: Ahmedy Coulibaly was one of two terrorists who killed four at a kosher supermarket in Paris on Jan. 9.

Both the Dawgfather and Dieudonné have since removed their provocative posts from the web and offered apologies of a sort. It remains to be seen whether that will be enough to assuage law enforcement agencies in Canada and France, since in both cases there is reason to believe that hate-speech laws have been contravened.

But many are nonetheless wondering whether these men are being treated unfairly. Why is Charlie Hebdo, which routinely and graphically mocks Islam, held up as a beacon of free speech, while the likes of Dieudonné and the Dawgfather are derided, perhaps even punished, for mocking their own chosen targets?

In the weeks since the Charlie Hebdo attack, many of us have been pondering the meaning of freedom of expression. "Je suis Charlie" has come to define much more than solidarity with those gunned down inside the magazine's office. For some, it has turned into a rallying cry for the notion that all of us must be allowed to say what we want, no matter who or what might be offended. Others, including Pope Francis and any number of media outlets who opted not to reprint Charlie Hebdo's cartoons after the attack, have argued just the opposite – that the lesson here is we must be careful what we say, even if we have the right to say it.

Free speech represents the true essence of democracy, but it is undeniably discomforting at the same time. It's easy enough to extol the virtues of unfettered expression when we aren't the ones being offended. But when the very ethos that underpinned the work of Charlie Hebdo is invoked in a way that makes us uncomfortable or angry or even scared we may be tempted to respond differently. In those moments, we face an existential predicament: do we affirm free speech or shut it down? If there's a middle ground, it's hard to see it. ■ — YONI

Coming of age in apartheid South Africa

Ismé Bennie

Apartheid was flourishing in my growing-up years. Jews were widely thought of as being opponents of this system of racial injustice, their liberal values being deeply rooted in a history of persecution in Eastern Europe. But there was also unspoken support for the government, not wanting the status quo to be disrupted or the economic and social superiority over the black populace to be undermined. And some felt that the government's focus on the blacks kept its attention away from the Jews, who might otherwise be targets.

Many South Africans, Jews, and non-Jews, who could not accept living in a racially split society, with its black underclass, left the country. Some were forced to leave, to escape arrest because of their political sympathies or activities against the system; some had no choice about remaining, being imprisoned or under house arrest as victims of the government's relentless persecution. Many of the names of whites in the forefront of the struggle for freedom were Jewish.

Many of my South African countrymen came to Canada. Not all were politically motivated to leave; economic concerns played a large role, too. One woman, a recent immigrant in those days, said she was pleased to be without servants: "They eat you out of house and home. They put butter on both sides of the bread." These sentiments may not have been specifically Jewish, but I was shocked to hear them spoken unabashedly by a Jewish mouth.

My father's brothers and sisters were Lithuanian immigrants. When they spoke amongst themselves, they spoke Yiddish. I know some Yiddish words like chutzpah, but most others that I knew have faded from memory. But a word I do know, I heard often amongst Jews and still do – schwartze, meaning "black person," usually said in a derogatory way.

I cringe when I hear it come out of a Jewish mouth. And now when on a trip back to South Africa, I visit an old friend or family member, someone with whom I grew up and with whom I have an almost identical background, and I hear the black maid being shouted at, my level of discomfort is great, and I find it difficult to accept that, in spite of shared childhood experiences, we still have such divergent attitudes towards right and wrong.

My mother thought of herself as a liberal, a relative term in apartheid South Africa. It did not mean she was at the forefront of the fight against the apartheid regime, standing in silent vigil along the roadside as a member of the Black Sash, an organization of white women demonstrating against the increasing enforcement of oppressive racial segregation. My mother treated our servants better than most, fed and housed them comfortably – all again, relative.

We had several servants – Nanny, the cook/housemaid, Simon, the houseboy, Emily the wash-girl, and Daniel, the driver. Nanny had started off as just that – nanny to my sister Pauline, but as they shared a name, to avoid confusion, she was called Nanny. Nanny was promoted to housemaid when my sister and I were too old to need one. Sarah and James, our original house servants, were then retired to Top Location, one of the nearby non-white townships.

Every day Nanny brought early morning coffee up to our rooms, a South African tradition. Cooking was part of her job description. She wasn't a great cook, but then we ate pretty routine meals, and it was my mother, like many South African housewives, who did the fancy stuff like baking – chocolate cake, cheesecake, biscuits, and the traditional Jewish dishes at High Holiday times. Simon did the rough work, sweeping, polishing, and cleaning the windows. Emily came to wash on Mondays, and to iron on Tuesdays, with her baby strapped to her back in a blanket.

Nanny had two daughters, Tsotsie (little rascal) and Girlie, who lived with her. It was illegal in those days for them to be there, but my parents left it alone. Tsotsie's wedding was held on a summer's day in our backyard. My mother said it would be OK for the black guests to come inside to use our downstairs washroom.

After I left South Africa, I seldom went back. But one of the occasions I did go home was for my nephew Dan's bar mitzvah. It was still during those apartheid years. Just like the celebrations of my youth, the religious ceremony and luncheon reception was followed by an evening party for Dan's friends.

Shirley, the black maid, who had worked for my sister since my nephew was born and who had looked after him through 13 years, summoned her son Stephen to the event. All dressed up, he looked like a city boy, even though in those days he was not allowed by law to live there with his mother. The two of them sat in the synagogue, two sole black figures in the white congregation, proudly listening to my nephew read his portion of the service.

In the early evening, Dan's friends started arriving. This was their time to celebrate. The grown-ups continued to drink outside in a desultory fashion, the communion of the evening scotch. At one time I went indoors for some more ice. I looked into the room where the youngsters were dancing, nice middle-class kids having a good time. Also watching them was the black boy Stephen, still all smartly dressed in the clothes specially bought for today, a boy the same age as the rest, but not so much as even noticed by them as he stood in the shadows, a boy as bright as the rest, but it would never even have occurred to them to include him.

Did he feel left out? Would he even dare to think in those days that he could be one of them? I stood helplessly in the doorway watching him watch the others. ■

Domestic abuse is a Jewish issue, too

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Lynda can recall the very moment she gave into her then-husband's psychological and emotional abuse, giving him total control over her life.

"It was a situation when we were moving into our apartment and my parents were helping me in the apartment. He came home from work – this was before we were married – and he said, 'You have to choose, it is either me or them.'"

She chose him.

Lynda, who was married to her ex-husband for 13 years, said the abuse and the control he had over her started small and gradually escalated.

"I started becoming what he thought I should be rather than staying true to myself and along the way I lost my voice," Lynda said.

"I had three kids by the time I was 30. By that time, he controlled everything. He controlled the money, he controlled every single thing. He even kept track of my menstrual cycle so he knew when we could have sex."

Lynda's account is one of many Jewish women's stories of abuse suffered at the hands of their husbands.

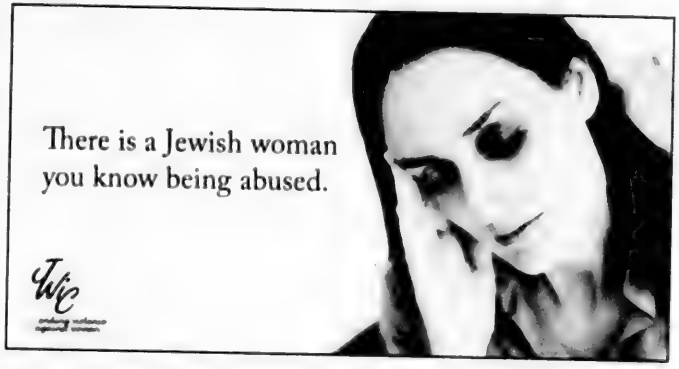
Sadly, Jewish families are just as susceptible to domestic abuse as those in any other community.

"For most people in our community, they don't believe it happens to us. They believe the Jewish community is immune to such things, because of our tremendous value on family and shalom bayit," said Penny Krowitz, the executive director of a non-profit organization that partners with Jewish Family and Child Services called Act To End Violence Against Women (ATEVAW).

According to the Jewish Coalition Against Domestic Abuse, one in four women experience domestic abuse during their lifetime and abuse occurs in the Jewish community at the same rate as in the community at large – about 15 to 25 per cent of families.

"Understanding what abuse looks like is so important," Krowitz said.

"There is a lack of understanding of it in the Jewish community, and I assure you that for all the women we know about, there are that many more who are living in abusive relationships. I've had women say to me, after I've spoken at a sisterhood event, and they've said, 'Oh my God, I never knew it was called abuse," she said, adding that women often think that if their husbands aren't hitting them, they're not being abused.



The billboard erected by Act to End Violence Against Women in 2006.

Domestic abuse can be defined as an imbalance of power, when one uses threats or physical force to create fear, control or intimidate another.

In 2006, ATEVAW launched a campaign to raise awareness about domestic abuse in the Jewish community by erecting billboards along Bathurst Street in Toronto.

The billboards portrayed a woman with a black eye and read, "There is a Jewish woman you know being abused."

"Our goal was to portray all Jewish women, but not to have a woman who was all beaten up, because the majority of abuse is verbal, emotional, psychological, financial, spiritual, sexual – it's not visible abuse," she said.

"The night before it went up I didn't sleep all night. I thought, 'The community is going to kill me,' to be honest with you," Krowitz said.

"We did get the comment, 'How dare you air our dirty laundry in public…' That was sad. But the best phone call I got was from a woman who said, 'I thought I was the only one.'"

Krowitz said raising awareness about the issue, and dispelling myths about what abuse is and is not, is central to the work she and her colleagues do across the country.

Diane Sasson, executive director of Montreal's kosher women's shelter, Auberge Shalom Pour Femmes, said the percentage of clients who are Jewish at the shelter is about 20 per cent, and about 35 per cent for its external services for women who aren't living in the facility.

Sasson said that now more than ever, people understand there are many types of abuse.

"Even in the more Orthodox world [which tends to be more traditional and insular], there is more of an understanding that there are many forms of abuse… I think there has been progress… but we still have tons of work to do, because while there is a better general understanding… The problem is not gone," said Sasson, who has been running Auberge Shalom for the past 20 years.

"There is more awareness, but the problem itself is still festering. I think it's about men having permission to be the stronger one in the relationship, and I believe that the patriarchal line [of authority] is still there. So yes, there is more awareness, but I don't think the change has been made."

Despite leaving her abusive husband 13 years ago, Lynda only learned about ATEVAW last year, and has been volunteering with the organization ever since, in the hope she can help other women who need support.

When she left her husband, "I didn't reach out because I didn't know that anything was available. I came from a family where you didn't talk about that stuff. I mean, I watched abuse all my life between my parents – verbal, emotional and sometimes physical with my parents. That was my life. I didn't know any different," Lynda said.

"I remember talking to my mother-in-law [about domestic abuse] and she would say, 'Oh it doesn't happen – there's no abuse in the Jewish community.' And I'm sitting there thinking, 'Yes there is.' I hadn't yet identified it in my relationship with him, but I knew that I had grown up with it."

Advocating can be rewarding and challenging

David Cape

This month I am excited to begin my tenure as chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), the advocacy agent of Canada's Jewish federations. Having been involved in advancing the interests of the Jewish community in Quebec for many years, and having served on CIJA's board and worked closely with my colleagues across the country, I can only summarize the current landscape of Jewish Canadian advocacy as one of extraordinary opportunities and challenges.

Our community enjoys unprecedented freedom and equality in Canada, matched by remarkably strong Canada-Israel ties backed by cross-party support on Parliament Hill. At the same time, our Jewish friends and family in Europe and Israel face shifting, multifaceted, and often urgent security threats – as seen in the recent horrific anti-Semitic attack in Paris. As Canadian Jewish advocates, we must do all we can to support our fellow Jews overseas, while continuing to make a strong contribution here at home by advancing policies and causes that benefit all Canadians.

CIJA's work consists of both advocacy and community building. Our focus is primarily on those segments of Canadian society – including the political sphere, media, and civil society – that shape public policy and frame how issues are debated. Effective advocacy requires seeing these key actors as partners for our community in advancing a shared vision of Canada at home and Canada's contribution internationally.

Effective advocacy also depends on having a strategic plan based on sound research, independent data, and methods that have stood the test of experience. This is the basis of the successful "shared values" approach that has characterized CIJA's work and has in turn been adopted by other Jewish advocacy organizations around the world.

I am pleased that we will be conducting new public opinion research in the coming year. The goal is to test our assumptions about what drives Canadian attitudes toward Israel and the Jewish community, and how we can most effectively build support for our cause, which is to improve the quality of Jewish life in Canada by advancing the public policy interests of our vibrant community.

I anticipate a very busy agenda this year. While security and the anti-terrorism file will continue to be a priority, our team is involved in a range of policies and causes that do not often make headlines but are of crucial importance to our community. For example, CIJA has been working diligently to resolve the issue of availability and cost of kosher poultry in Ontario. This issue alone directly affects the pocketbooks and quality of life of thousands of Jewish families across the province.

At the same time, CIJA is working on various human rights causes in keeping with our community's tradition of fighting bigotry. This includes legislation to ban genetic discrimination as well as legal provisions to protect transgendered Canadians.

Advocating on behalf of the Jewish community can be very rewarding, and very challenging. I joined many other Jewish Canadians who take great pride in Israel, and the sense of understanding that Canada has developed for the situation in the Middle East. At the same time, our community has a diversity of views and concern that all views are not heard. We also struggle to fight adversaries who are unconcerned about truth, freedom and justice, and these struggles are often faced most vividly by our youths at our universities. To continue to support them, and our entire community, we need your ongoing support. Every member of our community has the potential to make a difference.

As CIJA chair, I want to create more opportunities to leverage the talent, energy, and experience of every community member who wants to get involved. Please connect with me at info@cija.ca to share your thoughts on how we can best advance our community's interests. ■

Giving with the hand, heart and mind

Daniel Held

Over the last few weeks, three tzedakah moments have made me think about three tzedakah habits.

The first moment took place in December, when our daughter, along with 250,000 PJ Library subscribers across North America, received a little blue tin tzedakah box. While at first she insisted on putting chocolate Chanukah gelt through the little slot, each Friday night since receiving the box, she's put a couple of coins into the box, delighting in the clink as they drop.

The weekly ritual has become an important part of developing a habit of hand. For our daughter, tzedakah is now a regular practice and part of her weekly routine. This regularity and structure of giving is a lesson I could learn for my own giving. I, too, should learn to give to charity as a regular practice, rather than waiting for a friend to run a marathon or a campaign to ask for a donation. Putting the coins in the tin box is also a tactile task. She feels the coins, reaches up onto the sideboard and stretches for the tin. The physical task is an important part of her habit of the hand.

In giving tzedakah, we must develop a habit of the hand, one that is both regular and physical.

The second moment took place five years ago, but was recently jogged in my memory by an anniversary. On Jan. 12, 2010, I was travelling in a rickety van down a gravel road in the Yucatan Peninsula with a group of rabbinical students. We were spending a week volunteering in an impoverished Mexican community, helping to build a workshop for local craftspeople. On the radio, we heard news of the earthquake in Haiti. Over the next few months, efforts to send relief supplies and aid to Haiti were mounted in communities across North America.

For me, the experience of being immersed in a developing community – meeting the people face to face, living in their homes and understanding their lives – developed a tzedakah habit of the heart. It grew an urgency of tzedakah that was driven by passion and emotion, love and empathy. My experience in Mexico extended through the relief efforts in Haiti, and while images of both continue to tug at my heart, in the intervening years, they have begun to dim.

In giving, we must develop a habit of the heart, a sense of purpose and reason, passion and compassion.

The third moment took place by email. An American colleague recently pointed out that in 2008, shortly after the Madoff investment scandal rocked Jewish charities and at the height of the financial crisis, a group of philanthropists convened a summit to plan for the coming lean years of philanthropy. Their planning was critical in guiding the North American Jewish community through turbulent years. My colleague asked, "Today, with the stock market recovering, unemployment dropping, and the economy recovering, who is calling a summit to plan for the coming fat years of giving"

On a macro level, this communal planning is a habit of the head for tzedakah. But such a habit is required by each of us, as we carefully select and plan out giving. The needs of our community and our world are so great that each of us must develop unique thinking to guide our own tzedakah.

These three tzedakah moments have helped me clarify three habits that I hope to develop in myself and my daughter.

For her, the little blue tin box is developing the first habit of hand – regular giving. When she's ready, we'll help her develop her own habits of the heart and mind – her own passions and processes for tzedakah that will hopefully guide her philanthropy for years to come. ■

The Bible through fresh eyes

Jean M. Gerber

Recently I began a quest: to read all the books on our shelves. It's a way to recall first encounters with the many volumes we own, and to see if I recover the same feelings I had when I first read them. Are we what we read? Let's see.

I was inspired to do this by a book in which the author does the same thing. Not knowing where to begin, I started with the top shelf. Note: Our books are loosely arranged by genre, but more often by how they fit on the bookshelf!

In honour of World War I, I reread All Quiet on the Western Front and Timothy Findley's The Wars. They remind us of a war, heartbreakingly futile, that helped to lead Europe into World War II.

Amos Oz's biography, A Tale of Love and Darkness, gives the reader a unique entrance to the pre-state city and heart of Jerusalem, as well as its birth pangs. He depicts the interior world of a lonely child, the secrets of a family, the ultimate pain and silence of his mother's death.

Don Quixote broke my heart.

Some books no longer resonate with me. They go to the book sale.

One example – Solomon Gursky Was Here. When I first read it, I was amused. It was a picaresque assault on Canadian Jews, collectively and individually. This time? I found it uselessly cruel. The foibles and tragedies of its characters did not entertain, they embarrassed, and I felt ashamed, for them and for myself.

On the other hand, John Irving's A Prayer for Owen Meany is a keeper. While I still found that its underlying motif of redemption is overtly Christological, it remains a magical read.

But the final read I want to talk about is, in fact, a recent acquisition.

Introduction to the Bible, by scholar of Bible and Talmud Christine Hayes, is one of the open Yale courses from that august institution (yalebooks.com/oye). Drawing on a wide range of modern biblical scholarship, Hayes opens up the texts to our modern minds, starting with the stories in Genesis, with clarity and deep respect for traditional as well as contemporary approaches.

Some of our greatest heroes have always seemed remote to me – Abraham, Moses – too grand to be human. Not so the story of Joseph, a great novel in its own right, the conflicted Jacob, the all-too-male King David. These become more, well, believable, not in their historicity, but in the way the texts give us insight into their characters, their historical and political situations, their great moments as well as their failings and faults.

The canny Jacob, even the invisible Isaac – all come to life when we give them a chance to breathe again, viewed through modernity's eyes. It truly makes them grow in stature rather than diminishing them.

A fresh read of Abraham and Ishmael: we look at the text through other eyes – Abraham's constant love for Ishmael as his firstborn shines through all of his "tests." Maybe Isaac knew this, to his sorrow.

David was a complex and canny man presented with all his failings. Did the chronicler of his reign want us to remember him as a paragon? Or, more likely, as a man seriously flawed, but strong enough to unite a quarrelsome bunch of tribes. Yet, finally, he is presented as the person who invested the kingship with power that, when turned to idolatry, brought ruin on the state.

Still we love him. Because (and this is not in Hayes' book) he gives us hope.

But beginnings, I talked about beginnings. While I work my way through our library this year, I keep coming back to our foundational text, whether Hayes or – a totally different challenge! – Aviva Zornberg's books on Genesis and Exodus, read for each parshat hashavuah (the parshah of the week). Our Bible demands we continue to look at it through a world of various eyes. Every time, a new beginning. ■

Much work needed for French Jews to feel safe

Paul Michaels

In the aftermath of Amedy Coulibaly's Jan. 9 attack on a kosher supermarket in Paris, the National Post's editorial "City of darkness" captured the unique threat that France's Jews have faced for some time: "The forces of Islamism sometimes target Canada and sometimes the U.K., sometimes a downtown cafe and sometimes a media outlet. But sooner or later, they always come after the Jews."

Acting in affiliation with the Kouachi brothers, who, two days before, executed journalists and others at the satirical publication Charlie Hebdo, Coulibaly told BFM-TV that his seizure of hostages at that supermarket was no accident: he deliberately targeted a Jewish business and quickly selected four Jewish customers to murder.

In a national address Jan. 9, French President François Hollande denounced the siege of the kosher market as an "anti-Semitic attack."

Yet, despite Coulibaly's media statement and Hollande's characterization of Coulibaly's assault, it was surprising how many western news outlets ignored these facts and failed to note the centrality of anti-Semitism in Coulibaly's actions. It was not until the massive rally in Paris on Jan. 11, when many Muslims carried the sign "Je suis Juif," that mainstream media devoted attention to the French Jewish community who feel under siege.

Islamic extremists have targeted French Jews for quite some time, including rioting against Jews and attacking synagogues during last summer's Gaza war, and murdering three Jewish schoolchildren and a rabbi in Toulouse in 2012.

On Jan. 5, days before the attacks on Charlie Hebdo and the kosher supermarket, Natan Sharansky, head of the Jewish Agency, told the Jerusalem Post that, in 2014, approximately 50,000 French Jews asked the agency for information about immigrating to Israel.

Last year, about 7,000 Jews left France for Israel, a number representing about 70 per cent of the total number who emigrated from France (and twice as many as the number who immigrated to Israel) in 2013. Others went elsewhere in Europe or to North America with many settling in Montreal.

As the Post reported, "According to a 2013 study of European Jewry by the EU's Fundamental Rights Agency, up to a third of the Jews in several countries [especially Belgium, France and Hungary] are mulling emigration.

Given that there are approximately 600,000 Jews in France – by far the largest Jewish community in Europe – that amounts to a significant number considering emigration. The cultural and psychological impact on France would be enormous. No wonder the French government is stepping up efforts to assure its Jewish citizens about their security.

The rise of anti-Semitism stems not only from the growth of Islamic extremism, but also from the gains of far-right parties including Marine Le Pen's National Front (even as she decries the anti-Semitism of the party's former leader, her father), and from Hungary's Jobbik party, which makes no effort to hide its anti-Jewish sentiment.

Yet, where Islamic extremism in France is concerned, even if manifest in only a tiny percentage of France's six million Muslims, much must be done to rein it in so that French Jews can indeed be made to feel safe.

To take just one example of the challenge: the liberal Israeli journalist Ben-Dror Yemini wrote in Ynet News just after the first Paris attack of the need to counter not only young jihadists, but also certain Muslim religious leaders embraced by the French establishment who harbour a not-too-hidden agenda. Yemini pointed to Sheikh Yusuf al-Qaradawi, the Qatari-based Muslim Brotherhood spiritual figure famous for, among other things, anti-Semitic diatribes on Al-Jazeera Arabic.

According to Yemini, Dalil Boubakeur, the head of French Muslim establishment wanted Al-Qaradawi to be the honoured guest at a large Muslim convention. The French government, however, wouldn't allow Qaradawi into the country. "Now, Boubakeur is condemning the [Paris] attack," said Yemini. "Of course he's condemning it. But the condemnation is worthless as long as Boubakeur and others oppose any Muslim who dares to speak out against the funding from Qatar and the radicalization." ■

Beth David to host gay commitment ceremony

plungen@thecjn.ca

In what is being termed a landmark event among Conservative congregations in Toronto, Rabbi Philip Scheim will officiate next month at a "commitment ceremony" for a gay couple in the sanctuary of the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

The service will fall short of a halachically sanctioned marriage, but it will acknowledge the couple's commitment to each other and to live Jewish lives in the Jewish community, said Rabbi Scheim, Beth David's spiritual leader.

"I am performing a commitment ceremony," Rabbi Scheim said. "It recognizes their commitment to each other and it recognizes their decision to make a strong Jewish connection and a strong Jewish community connection."

Visually, the service for Josh Scheinert, 31, and Mark Friedman, 26, will resemble a traditional Jewish wedding, because of the venue, the presence of a chupah (canopy), and the breaking of a glass, which marks the conclusion of the formal ceremony. Kosher food will be served, Rabbi Scheim said. But the service won't include the traditional blessings, though substitute biblical verses will be read along with appropriate poetic verses. The ketubah (marriage contract) is also non-traditional.

"It is a parallel, but it is different," he said.

Rabbi Scheim said in crafting the service, he is relying in part on a text prepared by the Conservative Rabbinical Assembly, which has given the green light to same sex commitment ceremonies.

Gay marriage is an issue that has divided the Jewish world. Orthodox congregations do not permit them while marriage ceremonies are performed in Reform temples.

"What I'm doing is centrist in a wider movement… In Toronto, it is groundbreaking," Rabbi Scheim said.

Ironically, Rabbi Scheim voted against gay commitment ceremonies eight years ago when he served as part of the Rabbinical Assembly's committee on Jewish law and standards.

But since then, he's changed his mind.

"As I get older, I didn't want to find a way to say 'no' to people who really wanted that connection [to the Jewish community]. I wanted a way to say 'yes.'"

"I wanted to follow Halachah and bring into the Jewish fold those who want to be in the Jewish fold."

In that sense, he continued, the Conservative movement is catching up to what the wider world has accepted and what the members of its congregations want.

Rabbi Jarrod Grover, spiritual leader at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue, said he was asked by the couple to perform the service at his Bayview Avenue shul. But the congregation was not in a position to agree, because of various administrative and legal hurdles that had to be overcome.

He told the couple the synagogue is already considering changes to its by-laws and internal documents, which refer to heterosexual unions in the context of marriages and cemeteries and which could not be amended in time for their planned February wedding. The issue is on the shul's agenda and its ritual committee is currently addressing it, Rabbi Grover said.

As for the upcoming ceremony, "I think this is a groundbreaking event. This is the first Conservative synagogue in the city to allow the ceremony," he said.

"It's a difficult issue, but I believe we have to do something for couples like this who want to live a committed Jewish life in the Jewish community.

"There are halachic and historical challenges to this," he acknowledged, "but this is a reality that is not going away, and the answer the Jewish community gives can't be that there can't be any intimacy in their lives. I don't think this is a tenable response. It's the equivalent of pushing people out the door."

Rabbi Grover, who is a personal friend of Scheinert, said he gave his most widely heard sermon of the year about homosexuality on Kol Nidre night before a packed audience at Beth Tikvah.

"I asked the community to welcome same-sex couples into our community."

He admits he was a little unsure how the congregation would react, but he said it has been "overwhelmingly positive."

"I believe people in my synagogue want to accept. They probably have gay and lesbian people in their families or as friends, and they want them included."

"The times have changed."

Rabbi Scheim said he, too, has changed with the times. Even as recently as two years ago, he would not have sanctioned, let alone presided over, a same-sex union, he said.

"I think the world is in a different place now. Look at the acceptance in the general community. Gay marriage is a non-issue now."

Rabbi Scheim said there was much greater push-back 30 years ago when women first became ordained as rabbis.

Scheinert understands that people of Rabbi Scheim's generation might look at the commitment ceremony as groundbreaking, but for himself and Friedman, and for their friends, it's just another wedding.

Scheinert said and he and Friedman grew up attending Conservative synagogue services, and both feel attached to the Jewish community.

"Judaism has been a part of our lives and we liked the symbolism of getting married under a chupah," he said.

The couple spent the last five months in India, including a trek to the base camp on Mount Everest. They were there during Passover and brought with them Haggadot and matzahs to celebrate the holiday.

They held their own seder at 4,600 metres – the Chabad rabbi in Katmandu agreed it was likely the highest one ever – and their Nepalese guide participated by searching for the afikoman, Scheinert said.

Concert to support Jews living in poverty

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Working on a Dream is not only the album title by rock icon Bruce Springsteen, but it also describes United Jewish Appeal's (UJA) mandate to assist members of the Jewish community who need support.

Some 800 music enthusiasts will help that dream along at a fundraising concert at the Opera House, Jan. 24 at 8:30 pm. The Working on a Dream concert will feature the River Street Band, a Springsteen cover band, as well as Jesse Gold, a rising 22-year-old singer/songwriter and guitarist, in support of UJA's annual campaign and its ongoing efforts to help the more than 24,000 Toronto Jews who live below the poverty line.

"The UJA's closing event for the 2015 annual campaign promises to be a high-energy musical evening that will engage the community and show appreciation for its ongoing support," said event chair Jeff Olin.

The 2015 campaign co-chairs Andrea Cohen and David Matlow wanted to do something fun to wrap up the campaign: a musical event where many worlds could intersect.

"This concert is for everyone – for those of us who were together in high school in the '80s, as well as today's youth of 19 and up," said Matlow.

"What better way to celebrate than a concert with a party atmosphere for a $30 ticket? You will have fun and raise awareness for an important social cause," Olin added.

"The issue of poverty in the Jewish community is not well-known or well-understood. The dream is to be able to help our fellow Jews who are in difficulty, whatever that difficulty may be – poverty, drug abuse, or living in a domestic situation that is abusive – and that we raise enough money for everyone who needs that help. That's the dream," Matlow said.

River Street Band founder Don Denaburg, who sings vocals and plays guitar and harmonica, told The CJN, "Springsteen's songs talk about the plight of people who are struggling and who are having to stand up in spite of the odds against them and keep pushing ahead and fighting for the hope and belief and promise of something better. I think that relates to Israel and the people in our Jewish community who are struggling and living below the poverty line."

Poverty among Jews is growing, community officials say.

"There are 24,315 Jewish poor in the Greater Toronto Area, representing a poverty rate of 12.9 per cent – an increase of two percentage points since 2001. Of the 24,315 members of the Jewish community who are poor, 3,545 are children and 5,035 are over age 65. There are also 3,850 'working poor' in the local Jewish community who earn wages that are not sufficient to push their income above the poverty line," said Sandi Pelly, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's director of capacity building for the social services.

"Statistical projections suggest that the figure of 30,965 Jewish elderly in 2011 will increase to 43,917 by 2021. Nearly one-third of the seniors in Toronto are Holocaust survivors and 25 per cent of those survivors are poor," Pelly added. ■

Dr. Daniel Drucker's research has transformed care for millions of patients with type 2 diabetes by informing the development of entirely new drug therapies. This work has helped make Mount Sinai's Lunenfeld-Tanenbaum Research Institute one of the top three centres for diabetes research in the world.
Dr. Daniel Drucker is also the 2014 recipient of the highest international recognition in diabetes research — the Manpei Suzuki International Prize. He is only the second person worldwide to be recognized with the 'triple crown' in diabetes research, having also been honoured with the 2014 Banting Medal for Scientific Achievement from the American Diabetes Association, and the 2011 Claude Bernard Medal from the European Association for the Study of Diabetes.

Israeli cartoonist praises dead Charlie Hebdo satirists

elevy@thecjn.ca

"If political cartoonists are the foot soldiers of democracy, the ones at Charlie Hebdo were the advance guard in vigorously defending, with their last breath, one of the cardinal values of democracy: freedom of expression," leading Israeli cartoonist Michel Kichka told The CJN in an interview last week.

"The Charlie Hebdo artists assassinated... by fanatical jihadists are great heroes. For editorial cartoonists, Charlie Hebdo represents the famous 'red line' that we aren't supposed to cross. With their provocative drawings, Charb [Stephane Charbonnier], Cabu [Jean Cabut], [Georges] Wolinski, Tignous [Bernard Verlhac] defined and drew this red line every week without beating about the bush."

A major political cartoonist and artist in Israel, Kichka was extremely upset about the Charlie Hebdo killings. Born in Belgium in 1954, Kichka, who made aliyah in 1974, grew up with the drawings of Cabu and Wolinski. Tignous was a close friend. Like Kichka, Tignous was a member of the organization Cartooning for Peace. Founded by Plantu, the renowned newspaper caricaturist for Le Monde, and former UN secretary general Kofi Annan, Cartooning for Peace includes artists from some 50 countries.

Asked by Israeli TV and radio to comment on the attacks in France, Kichka struggled to explain to the Israeli public what the work of the Charlie Hebdo artists, who exemplify a longstanding French satirical tradition, represents. He also wrote an in-depth article on the subject, accompanied by a special cartoon, published in Yediot Achronot, Jan. 9.

"Unfortunately, we don't have a satirical newspaper in Israel," Kichka said in an interview from Jerusalem. "I explained that drawing the prophet Muhammad every morning isn't what French artists do. In the 'official' French newspapers, you don't draw Muhammad. Charlie Hebdo is a satirical paper that declared war on good taste and where there were never any limits or taboos. At Charlie Hebdo, they always stretched the boundaries more than at other publications. But that doesn't mean French satirical newspapers are part of a marginal press."

Satirical media, led in France by Charlie Hebdo, are "an excellent way of measuring the state of health of a democracy," he said. "I think a healthy democracy must be able to accept things that are out of their control, including those that infringe on the law. At Charlie Hebdo, they make provocative statements every day. It's the business of this vitriolic paper."

Will the Charlie Hebdo attacks embolden other artists to cross the line?

"When you draw for Charlie Hebdo, you can produce very provocative drawings, even a little silly," Kichka said. "But when you present those drawings in exhibitions organized by Cartooning for Peace, which go online on the organization's website, you have to do 'intelligent drawings,' that is, drawings that you have given some thought to, being aware that the caricatures circulate on the Internet and are no longer confined to a small village in Denmark."

For political cartoonists, Charlie Hebdo is "a kind of standard we refer to constantly," Kichka stressed. "The artists at Charlie Hebdo make me ask myself questions about my own limits when I take up my pencil. Their invaluable work sometimes helps me see deep down that I can go further than I usually do, that maybe I hold myself back too much, that maybe it's the Charlie Hebdo artists who are sometimes right. I also carry on a dialogue with myself comparing their work to mine. Then I tell myself, 'This time, it was my colleagues at Charlie Hebdo who were right. Maybe I should have gone further.' After all, drawing is a [form of] combat. You have to hit harder sometimes."

Kichka's Jan. 9 Yediot Achronot cartoon

Kichka teaches drawing at the Bezalel Academy of Arts and Design in Jerusalem. His cartoons on national and international events appear weekly on several popular Israeli public affairs TV shows. For several years, he chaired the Israeli Association of Caricaturists and Comic Artists. ■

No imminent danger, but Jewish institutions remain alert

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Staff at Canadian Jewish institutions – synagogues, schools and community centres – are being asked to be more vigilant in light of the recent terror attacks in Paris that included the murder of four Jews at a kosher supermarket.

Adam Cohen, the Israeli-born, Montreal-based national director of security at the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said that although there isn't anything to suggest an attack on Canadian Jewish institutions is imminent, world events like these can lead to copycat attacks.

"Because of that, we told our synagogues and schools to be extra vigilant," Cohen said.

"I've talked to teachers and students... if you're leaving your school or entering it and there is someone next to you that you don't know, don't hold the door open. Just like you don't hold the door open for a stranger to come into your home at night, you're not going to hold the door open for a stranger to come into your school if you don't know who they are."

Cohen added that police across the country have been increasing their patrols around Jewish institutions.

Toronto Police Service spokesperson Const. Jenifferjit Sidhu said, whenever there is "a significant world event," police will generally increase their patrolling of relevant areas of the city.

"At this time, we have no reason to be on alert here in Toronto," she said. "[But] each division that does have Jewish schools or synagogues, that particular division would be aware of it, and in general make sure their presence is visible – not because there is a threat, but just to be visible in the area and do proactive policing."

Many of the staff at Jewish institutions in Toronto and Montreal that were contacted by The CJN were advised by Cohen not to discuss their security protocols with the media, but a number of synagogues and schools did release statements about the issue.

"In the wake of this latest round of terror in France, working with our local Toronto Police division, marked police cruisers were constantly patrolling on Bathurst [Street] and in both of our parking lots this past Saturday," wrote Russ Joseph, Holy Blossom Temple's executive director, in a statement posted to the shul's website.

"This, we are told, with a combination of our regular security force, augmented by police officers, is the appropriate response based upon an assessment of risk."

Adam Cohen

Helen Fox, principal of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, wrote in a statement that she's been advised there is no intelligence that suggests a need for increased security measures.

"The tragic events that unfolded in Paris have reminded us of the need for heightened awareness and concern at school. We will be reminding students through our regular daily announcements of the need to be constantly vigilant when it comes to reporting intruders, suspicious packages, and any other odd or unusual activity at or around school," Fox wrote, adding that the school doors will now be locked at all times during the school day.

Students will have to use their personal access cards to gain access to the building.

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto sent a similar statement to parents and staff, to assure the community that "our security is visible, and our security guards are trained by reliable agencies to deal with any potential threats... We want to assure you that we are in regular communication with our local police authorities as well as CIJA, and we will continue this throughout the school year and beyond."

Cohen said he's confident in the security system in place at Jewish schools in Toronto, Montreal and elsewhere in Canada.

"We have all kinds of elements, all kinds of protocols and all kinds of systems that we put in our schools so that if, God forbid, something does happen, our schools have the know-how and the tools to go into full lockdown until help arrives," Cohen said.

"Are we 100 per cent [safe]? Never. Do I sleep well at night? I do."■

Jewish community gathers to recall Paris terror victims

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Deputy Consul General of France Dominique Faille called the attacks that left 17 French citizens dead "barbaric acts of violence."
CENTRE FOR ISRAEL AND JEWISH AFFAIRS PHOTO

In France, guards armed with sub-machine guns patrol outside Jewish schools and other community institutions – a reflection of the danger French Jews face in the home of liberty and fraternity.

In Toronto, it hasn't quite come to that. But at a Jan. 14 memorial service and solidarity rally in support of France and French Jews, police were visibly present and beefy security guards were everywhere. Security was tight in what has become the new normal for Jews when they gather to celebrate or to mourn.

Organizers and security personnel were not responding to any specific threats, said Steven Shulman, campaign director of UJA Federation. "After events in France and the general tenor in the world, we pay heed to that."

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, along with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), hosted the event at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. Some 600 people gathered to pray for the victims, stand in solidarity with France and French Jews, and hear the attackers condemned.

The audience listened to a variety of speakers: Berl Nadler, co-chair of CIJA's Toronto council; rabbis representing congregations across the religious spectrum; and French and Israeli diplomats.

Politicians from three levels of government were there, as were advocates of Christian-Jewish dialogue and representatives of the Ukrainian Canadian Congress and the Church of Scientology. Also present was a Shia imam who advocates interfaith dialogue.

Nadler began by pronouncing that "we in the West are at war with Islamist terrorists, all of them, for the future of western civilization."

He recounted incidents of terrorism around the world in the name of Islam, calling the attacks in Paris on Charlie Hebdo an attack on the fundamental value of free speech, while the deadly attack on a kosher grocery was an attack on the values of tolerance and pluralism.

Deputy Consul General of France Dominique Faille called the attacks that left 17 French citizens dead "barbaric acts of violence."

"French men and women were murdered because they represented free speech. French people were murdered because they were Jewish. French men and women were murdered because they supported free expression and the respect for all faiths," he said.

"Freedom of speech is essential in a democracy. Anti-Semitism is an unacceptable attack on democratic values.

"Together, we must defend democratic values. We owe it to ourselves to fight anti-Semitism, racism and hatred for others. We must keep matters clear. Let there be no mistake as to who the enemy is."

Faille didn't identify the enemy, though Israeli consul general DJ Schneeweiss wasn't so reticent. Linking the "Islamist terror" attacks faced by Israel to the recent ones in France, Schneeweiss said the proclamations in France of "je suis Charlie, je sui francais, je suis Juif... [are] an expression of a common heritage and a common fate shared by western civilization as a whole."

Jews are members of a broader society, "heirs to the western way of life infused with the values of tolerance, peace, freedom and individual rights, justice and the rule of law," he said.

"The battle lines are real. There is no escape from the consequences of the militant Islamic assault on our democratic values and way of life. We're all in this together. We must stand together, with each other and for each other, if the threat posed to us all by those who hate Jews, modernity and freedom is to be defeated," he said.

"When you see Jews being attacked, know that this is an attack on you. When you see Israel being maligned... know that this too is an attack on you.

"Don't airbrush the anti-Semitism inherent in much of the militant Islamic and Arab education out of the story," he continued. "No matter how much you may wish it weren't so, this hatred of Jews is a core component of militant Islam's aggressive agenda vis-a-vis the west and as a whole."

Schneeweiss ended on a hopeful note, saying Jews must stand together, never surrender to victimhood, and be comforted that they have many friends in Canada and elsewhere who are horrified when they're targeted for being Jews. ■

Israeli, Canadian ministers support 'Grand Challenges'

plungen@thecjn.ca

Economic ties between Canada and Israel continue to grow, with the announcement over the weekend that Grand Challenges Israel (GCI), which is modelled on Grand Challenges Canada (GCC), will fund 10 Israeli innovators offering solutions to health, water and agricultural challenges faced by developing countries.

The announcement came during a meeting on Sunday between Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird and Israeli Foreign Affairs Minister Avigdor Lieberman.

Israeli innovators will each receive 500,000 shekels ($152,000 Cdn) from GCI, to further research and product development in a variety of areas, including early detection of pneumonia, malaria control and biotechnology development.

GCI is an initiative of the chief scientist in the Ministry of the Economy, the Prime Minister's Office and MASHAV, Israel's Agency for International Development Co-operation within the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

It was created in consultation with Grand Challenges Canada and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). GCC was founded in 2010 and is funded by the Canadian government. It supports innovators in low- and middle-income countries, as well as in Canada, who attempt to integrate science and technology to offer benefits in health and other social concerns around the world.

The partnership between GCC and GCI was discussed by Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu during Harper's visit to Israel in January 2014.

Peter Singer, CEO of GCC, said the organization operates as a sort of venture capital program, injecting funds into early-stage efforts by innovators to produce products or solutions that will help developing countries in a variety of fields.

To date, GCC has provided $158 million to about 700 innovators operating in more than 70 countries. Other funders, including those in the private sector, have added another $224 million in later stages of product development.

Creation of GCI in co-operation with GCC "taps Israeli innovation and entrepreneurship to tackle global challenges," Singer said.

"Canada and Israel are working together to do good in the world, using science and innovation," he added.

Peter Singer

GCC played an important role in introducing GCI into an international network of similar organizations, including the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, as well as others in India and Brazil, Singer said.

Fifteen years ago, the Gates Foundation began to fund a meningitis vaccine that has been introduced into Africa, leading to a 90 per cent reduction in incidents of the disease, Singer stated.

"That's the kind of good people should expect from innovation." Not all projects will succeed, but those that do "will be transformative. Innovation can be a game-changer," he added.

"I think it's something that Canadians in the Jewish community can feel proud of, the way Canada is supporting Israel to improve the lives of people in the developing world," Singer said.

"Today's announcement is the latest example of the significant mutual benefits to be found in burgeoning Canada-Israel research and technology ties," said Shimon Fogel, CEO of CIJA.

"That Israelis looked to Canada for a model to nurture innovation is a direct result of the countless partnerships and connections that have been forged between Canadian and Israeli researchers, academics and relevant government ministries," he said.

"CIJA was pleased to play a supporting role in bringing GCC to Israel. We look forward to seeing the results of their exciting projects.

We will continue working to strengthen Canada-Israel research partnerships – which have the potential to solve some of the most pressing challenges facing the world today," Fogel stated. ■

Israeli consul general makes first visit to Halifax

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT

Israeli Consul Ziv Nevo Kulman helped open The Courage To Remember exhibit in Halifax.

Ziv Nevo Kulman expected a warm welcome on his first visit to Halifax – and he received it.

What he didn't expect were questions surrounding an anti-Semitic Twitter rant by a local hot dog vendor.

The visit of the recently appointed consul general of Israel to Quebec and the Atlantic provinces was marked with questions about the rant by the Muslim vendor who tweeted inflammatory statements Jan. 14 (see story on page 24). Jerry Reddick, known as the Dawgfather, talked about Jews and the Holocaust as he tried to make a point about free speech and the Charlie Hebdo Muhammad cartoons.

"All I can really say is that if this is the way he wants to promote his hot dog business, I'm glad I'm a vegetarian," Nevo Kulman joked during an interview on Global TV's morning show Jan 15.

Nevo Kulman was in Halifax to open The Courage To Remember exhibit, recognizing International Holocaust Remembrance Day and the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz.

Nevo Kulman also had business meetings with Nova Scotia government officials and researchers at Dalhousie University to promote co-operation between the Atlantic region and Israel. He addressed a church gathering of Bridges For Peace, a Christian group with strong Israeli ties, and he addressed a luncheon of Jewish seniors at the Masada Club.

Nevo Kulman, 45, the son of a Holocaust survivor from Poland, was born in Tel Aviv. He's held several positions in cultural affairs in Israel and abroad and most recently worked in the ministry of Foreign Affairs in Jerusalem in charge of diplomatic professional training.

He told the Masada group about his role as consul in promoting commercial, educational, scientific and cultural interests between the region and Israel.

"Commercial ties, specifically, between Canada and Israel could be better, because Israelis think of the United States more so than Canada. I have to work on that. But Israel is an open society based on immigration and multiculturalism, just like Canada, so I hope things can work better."

To the Masada and church groups, Nevo Kulman spoke of issues between Israel and the Palestinians.

"If Palestinians want to negotiate, but only using their moderates, establishing two states can be solved. Yet Hamas won't accept our presence and that's where it becomes dangerous."

He touched on the recent violence in France. "Perhaps now the world can see what radical terrorism can do," he said. "Western governments can see what might happen in their own cities. Israel has been quiet about this because we know the dangers of terror. We live with it every day. This is an international problem that needs international co-operation to stifle it."

Nevo Kulman expressed concern for the 500,000 Jews of France, who comprise one per cent of the country's population, compared to six million Muslims.

"Half the incidents of attacks in France in the last year were against Jews. The French government has to secure its citizens, but isn't doing enough. More than 7,000 Jews made aliyah to Israel last year. We can't tell others to come to Israel. It's their decision on their own but we'll open our doors if they choose.

Nevo Kulman's meeting with government and Dalhousie officials were successful, he said. "The Nova Scotia government emphasizes industrial ties and we spoke positively about agriculture and aquaculture opportunities.

"Martha Prago [Dalhousie's vice-president of research] was full of ideas and knows Israel well through our connections with Dal and Hebrew University, Ben-Gurion University and [BGU's Eilat campus]. Exchanges, involving dozens of people, are already going on in ocean research, water monitoring and neuroscience. There are good things happening."

The consul also met with the Halifax Chronicle Herald's editorial board, finding it "friendly, in an open and frank discussion. They asked intelligent questions."

Overall, Nevo Kulman was "overwhelmed with the hospitality of the people. Nova Scotia is a friendly province and I will be back," he stressed, adding, with a smile, "in the spring, when the weather is friendlier." ■

My grandmother's return to Auschwitz

HANNAH ZIEGLER

Miriam Ziegler with granddaughter Hannah

My grandmother, Holocaust survivor Miriam Ziegler, is busily preparing for a trip to a place she never thought she would go again.

On Jan. 27, she's returning to Auschwitz, joining more than 100 fellow survivors for the 70th anniversary of their liberation. She will also be reunited with five of the 13 children who were photographed by a Soviet photographer as the Russian soldiers approached to give them their freedom.

She didn't even know about the existence of this picture until a visit to Israel in 1981, where she saw the photo of herself on the walls of Yad Vashem. She likens the experience to "seeing a ghost."

Miriam Ziegler, born in Radom, Poland, experienced her first glimpse of war through four-year-old eyes.

"I left my hometown on horse and buggy with my mother when the war broke out. We saw the Nazis shoot our driver. That was my first of many escapes from death during the war."

We sit in her comfortable Thornhill condo discussing the traumatic events of the war. She seems a bit tired after having been interviewed by several news sources earlier in the week. She is not used to all the attention.

She shows me an old photo album, one of the only relics from her youth. She clutches these photographs, pointing out the many family members who were killed. "I didn't have a childhood," she explains.

Miriam spent her early years in Radom, the only child of store-owners Hershel and Rose Friedman. When Nazi soldiers marched into her town, she fled to her grandparents' village of Ostrowiec. She was hidden by a farmer, and then by a Polish woman, and survived a mass shooting in an attic before being smuggled back into the ghetto.

By the summer of 1944, Miriam and her family were transported to Auschwitz. She was one of the few children who survived the horrors of the death camp. She witnessed death marches and other atrocities about which she dared not utter a word. She was separated from her family and received a tattoo that reduced her to a number. "A16891. That was my name in Auschwitz," she laments. She points to her arm, a familiar pose.

When she was finally liberated on Jan. 27, 1945, she became part of what would become an iconic picture. She is seen standing with other children behind a barbed wire fence, pointing to her number. While all the children are standing solemnly and stiff, Miriam pointed to her tattoo instinctively. "I was so used to responding to my number," she explains.

Freedom should have tasted sweet, but Miriam felt nothing but dread. "I was standing there, numb, because I didn't know where my family was. I didn't know where I was going to end up."

She was relocated to an orphanage in Krakow before reuniting with her mother and grandmother. Her father, she eventually was told, died in a death march.

Miriam moved to Canada in 1948, where she later met and married Roman Ziegler, also a Holocaust survivor. They now have three children, and four grandchildren.

For a long time, my grandmother has been reluctant to talk about the Holocaust and the toll it's taken on her. When she was asked by the World Jewish Congress and USC Shoah Foundation to attend the 70th anniversary, she was hesitant to say yes. After a previous visit to Auschwitz in 1981, she vowed to never go back.

"It brought back horrible memories," she says. "They showed me a movie [of the liberation], and seeing myself being taken out of the gates to the orphanage..." She pauses for a few seconds to collect her thoughts. "I feel it is my duty to go back. I know there are not many survivors left to speak, and I need to speak on behalf of the millions who were killed, who had no voice. And I need to tell my story to the future generations so they will never forget."

My grandmother places her old photo album back on the table, surrounded by pictures of our family.

She will be joined by my aunt, Adrienne, on this trip. They will also be visiting Ostrowiec, where she hopes to find her grandparent's store and old house.

"Hopefully this will give me closure... I get more scared every day as the trip approaches, but I have to face it. I have to be there to say 'I am here, I am alive, and I have my family.'"

There is no doubt that this will be an emotional journey, but my grandmother has faced unimaginable challenges with strength and courage since she was four years old, and will do the same at age 79. This time the whole world will hear her voice. ■

Israeli company helps address cyber attacks

plungen@thecjn.ca

In December 2013, right in the middle of the Christmas shopping season, U.S. retail giant Target was hacked in the biggest-ever retail computer attack in the United States. Some 40 million credit card numbers were stolen. It cost Target more than $70 million to address the issue.

Then, nearly a year later, hackers calling themselves the "Guardians of Peace" illegally acquired data and personal information about Sony Pictures employees and their families. The hackers demanded cancellation of the planned release of the film The Interview, a comedy about a plot to assassinate North Korean leader Kim Jong Un.

And just last week, hackers claiming to be tied to the Islamic State (ISIL) gained access to the Twitter and YouTube accounts of the U.S. military's Central Command, or Centcom, though no classified material was compromised.

Hacking has become a serious concern for businesses, governments and non-governmental agencies of all types, say Carmi Gillon, executive chair of the board of directors of Cytegic, and Shay Zandani, the company's CEO. Cytegic is an Israeli startup specializing in addressing cyber attacks and providing senior management, government leaders and corporate executives the tools to monitor and address these attacks.

Gillon and Zandani were in Toronto and Winnipeg last week to introduce their company and its products to potential customers in the public and private sectors.

The fact that their product was developed in Israel, with its reputation for high-tech wizardry, didn't hurt their presentations. Israel has a well-deserved reputation for leading technological solutions to a variety of problems, they said.

It's likely their personal profiles didn't harm the credibility of their presentations either. Gillon is a former head of Shin Bet, Israel's internal security agency, and Zandani is the company's self-styled "cyber security guru." Before that, he founded the information warfare department for the Israel Air Force, and later served as CEO of Global Risk Management Solutions for PricewaterhouseCoopers.

> We expect the risk to go higher. We know that from strategic analysis.

Cytegic's product suite (a group of software products packaged together) is geared toward company CEOs and senior officials of other organizations, who often have to pay with their careers for cyber infiltrations that succeed. The CEO and board of directors of Target were all replaced after the credit card fiasco, Zandani pointed out.

Cyber attacks pose "a huge risk," Zandani stated before flying off to Winnipeg. "Not just for the business's reputation, but in direct costs. We expect the risk to go higher. We know that from strategic analysis."

Threats can originate with state players, he said, from organized crime, 'hacktivists,' disgruntled employees or even just young people in their parents' basement, showing off their computer skills.

The costs to business and government can be enormous. In addition to affecting the corporate bottom line, successful plots could have wider ranging consequences, equivalent of a terrorist attack. Zandani said plots have been uncovered to take down the electric grids in both the United States and the U.K.

With computers controlling other vital strategic infrastructure, it's not hard to imagine plots to disrupt traffic lights or to shut down air traffic by infiltration of the computer systems linked to airport x-ray machines. Your neighbourhood medical clinic could face cyber infiltration that would expose their patients' confidential medical information, Zandani suggested.

So how does Cytegic help keep cyberspace safe?

They offer product suites to collect and analyze massive amounts of data available in the public realm, sifting through it, determining trends and winnowing it down to usable information they call DYTA, or Dynamic Threat Analysis.

CYMA, the Cyber Maturity Assessment, then considers the efficiencies of existing defences, such as firewalls and anti-virus software, as well as organizational processes that permit an organization to identify and respond to threats. These can range all the way to the method a human resource department uses to deal with a potential threat, Zandani said.

Finally, Cytegic's CDSS or Cyber Decision Support System takes the information collected by DYTA, considers the security posture offered by CYMA and offers clients the best solution to the likeliest attack. Clients receive a dashboard display of potential threats that are constantly updated.

"Our product will give you all the existing risks," said Gillon. "Your customers decide on priorities and we give you advice if you are already protected and if you need to invest in more checkpoints or firewalls."

Gillon believes the market for Cytegic's products is substantial. They have already recruited several prominent clients in Israel, including Bank Hapoalim and Bank Leumi, and they have a commercial relationship with Telmex in Mexico.

Coincidentally – or not – the government of Canada announced last week it will invest $100 million in cyber security to safeguard government computers.

Cytegic believes success here could open the doors to the lucrative American market. But Canada is an important market in its own right, said Gillon, who met with potential clients in the financial services sector, energy, utilities and government. "Canada's behaviour is very much respected by other nations. I've spoken to a lot of Canadians. You are too modest.

"We think Canadians can be a base for us, not just for the United States, but the whole world," he added. ■

Dalhousie hot dog vendor tweets racist messages

BY JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT

The Dawgfather removed offensive and sensitive tweets from his Twitter page Jan. 16 and added several apologies to his followers in the wake of his anti-Semitic postings earlier in the week.

Jerry Reddick, a proud Muslim who has sold hot dogs outside Dalhousie University's Student Union Building for many years under the name Dawgfather, tweeted several racist messages Jan. 14 under the same name, many about Jews, the Holocaust and ovens.

"I used a sledgehammer to get my point across about the double standard in free speech. I was wrong and I apologize!" he tweeted Jan. 16.

He added: "I made hateful comments which were completely out of character and downright mean to my Jewish friends. I can't explain it! Forgive me!!!?"

On the morning of Jan. 16, his hot dog cart was also absent, something he attributed to "other business. I will be back next month after visiting family out west."

Halifax police continue to investigate the offensive posts. Police spokesperson Const. Pierre Bourdages said a complaint was received about anti-Semitic posts online. "The investigation has been assigned to the general investigation section, but there have been no charges and arrests."

The Dawgfather said his hot dog cart would be back Jan. 19, citing "working on other things" as the reason for its absence from the campus in the last few days.

Reddick admitted he posted the Twitter messages to prove a point about the different standards applied to freedom of expression, particularly related to world-wide comment on the Charlie Hebdo and kosher market shootings in Paris.

Reddick said in one post, "Yeah! This is what freedom of speech looks like from the other side."

Another post stated, "No group of people has more right than the other to express themselves. Muslims have never ever said any foul things about Jesus or Moses."

His remarks were made public on the day an event recognizing International Holocaust Remembrance Day and the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz was being held at the Nova Scotia Archives.

"The man is either demented, crazy or looking for trouble," Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council, said when he was shown a post that read, "How does freedom of expression look when it's not about Prophet Muhammad, s.a.w. Let's send ovens to all the Jews."

"It's right out of Goebbels, Himmler and Hitler," Goldberg said, adding the posts violate the country's hate crime laws.

Another post read, "Hitler asked his people, 'How do you like your Jews'? Well done with a bagel and a kosher pickle. Freedom of speech goes both ways."

Reddick also tweeted, "What do you call a Jew sitting in one of Hitler's ovens? Toast, because they're cooked. Freedom of speech goes both ways!" And, "What does one Jew say to the other Jew when they walk by a hot oven? Do you recognize anyone?"

Another post read: "In 2001 I thought Americans could fly by the way they were jumping from the twin towers in New York."

Goldberg said the comments make it clear that Reddick doesn't care who his words hurt, including survivors of World War II.

In one of his posts, Reddick insisted he is not anti-Semitic. "I respect all people. Nobody agrees with what them boys did in France, nobody. I just wanted to point out the hypocrisy."

In a Jan. 15 tweeted response to Goldberg, Reddick said: "Jon Goldberg should remember who ran and financed the trans Atlantic slave trade before he jumps on me."

He added: "I proved my point when Jon Goldberg comes out and compares me to a Nazi but he said nothing when a cartoon depicted Muhammad as a terrorist?"

Goldberg said he'd like to see the city rescind the Dawgfather's hot dog cart license, "now that we know exactly how he feels about members of our community."

Among the tweeted responses to Reddick were messages such as, "comparing a cartoon to the biggest genocide in history.." and "You're not just racist, you're a f--ing LUNATIC. I hope Dal gets wise and boycotts your idiot ass."

Another poster said "You take stupid to a whole new level. I feel sorry for your kids." ■

Never any threat of violence at Garneau event, CIJA spokesperson says

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

There was never any indication that a violent protest would take place at an event organized by a pro-Israel group where member of Parliament Marc Garneau was scheduled to speak, said a Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) spokesperson.

Eta Yudin said CIJA national director of community security Adam Cohen spoke at length with police, who told him they had information that there might be "a peaceful protest by people known to them" outside the event.

The event was to have taken place on the afternoon of Jan. 12 at the downtown office of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR), which had allowed the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America (CAMERA) to use its premises.

The chief organizer was Concordia University student Bradley Martin, a CAMERA fellow. He wrote on his Facebook page around noon on Jan. 12 that the event had been cancelled because police had notified CIJR that "a hostile and violent protest" was expected, and he expressed his disappointment and outrage that freedom of speech and assembly has been compromised.

Garneau, the Liberal foreign affairs and international trade critic, was to have spoken on Canada-Israel relations.

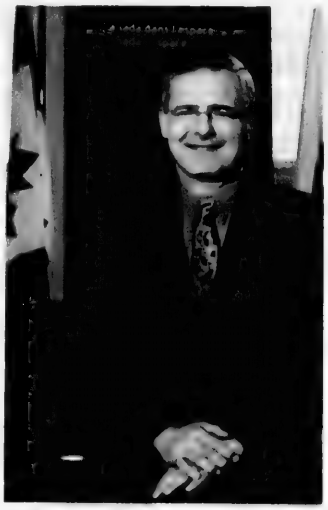
A CIJR staff member took a call from police on the morning of Jan. 12, CIJR chair Jack Kincler said.

Because there were "too many unknowns" and "in light of events that took place in France the week before," he decided to cancel the event.

Yudin said police confirmed that they were only notifying the organization of the information they had, but never advised pulling the plug on the event.

The incident, however, quickly circulated on social media. The group Israel on Campus: Concordia, reacting to Martin's post, commented on its Facebook page that "police were alerted of a planned violent protest, which has caused the organizers to cancel the event. We understand their concern given the rise of anti-Semitism and violent attacks around the world.

"It is extremely disheartening and upsetting that members of our own national government are not given a chance to share their ideas freely for fear of violent consequences... We will not be silenced and will continue to fight for Israel on campus and in our country."



Marc Garneau, the Liberal foreign affairs and international trade critic, was to have spoken on Canada-Israel relations on Jan.12 at the downtown office of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research.

Kincler said the police asked if the street-level entrance to the building would be locked at that time, and the CIJR informed them that the door is only secured after business hours.

"They gave us a red light, but they did not say cancel the event," he said. "I had no idea who might come in. Bradley also had no clue who might show up or how many. I didn't want a screaming match here."

Kincler, who was out of the country when the room was given to CAMERA, said that if it had been a CIJR event, he would not have cancelled it, but the organization always takes advance registration for its activities and keeps its address confidential.

Whatever might have happened, Kincler added that "it is unacceptable that it is always one side intimidating" the other in the Middle East conflict.

The CJN was unable to reach Martin for comment. He emailed on Jan. 13 that he had "too many prior commitments" to speak. He did not return follow-up emails and his phone line was either busy or not taking messages. ■

New fresh kosher lettuce now MK-certified

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, Montreal

Kosher consumers in Montreal will soon be able to enjoy salads with a greater variety of lettuce and without the laborious soaking, or even washing.

In December, the Vaad Ha'ir issued its MK hechsher to two packaged lettuce products from Urban Barns Inc., a new Montreal-based company that grows produce indoors year-round without soil or pesticides or chemicals of any kind, and with minimal watering and just the right amount of LED lighting.

The two products certified are its red romaine, which goes under the brand Breen, and butterhead, or Boston, dubbed Frank. They are sold "live," that is, with their roots intact, packed in plastic clamshells.

These lettuce heads grow in an attractive round, floral shape rather than upright, generally in an individual serving size. No need to tear them into pieces.

It's a breakthrough both for those who keep kosher and in technology, said Vaad executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel, who is highly impressed by Urban Barns' patent-pending "Cubic Farming" system. It's the result of five years of research and development that continues in conjunction with McGill University, which has a dozen scientists working with the company.

Invented by a Dutch-born farmer in Langley, B.C., this year-round, controlled-environment agriculture combines manufacturing production line practices with optimal growing conditions.

Non-GMO seeds are started in a naturally sourced fabric-like substrate. The tiny germinated plants are then transferred to a mechanical installation that consists of rows of trays in which the seedlings are positioned.

They are continuously rotated vertically under a series of lighting tubes and watered automatically, with the runoff recycled.

What thrills Rabbi Emanuel is that the produce is completely free of infestation and ready to eat. While lettuce, like all vegetables is, of course, pareve, the Vaad has strict rules about its consumption because of the risk of insects or worms, often too small for the untrained eye to see.

The only unpacked lettuce varieties the Vaad sanctions are iceberg and Boston, and they must be have their four outside leaves removed, be cut into quarters and all the leaves separated. The lettuce is then put in a solution of either vinegar, salt or soap and water for five minutes.

The water must then be rinsed off and every single leaf inspected carefully to make sure it is free of bugs. The only other packaged lettuce bearing the MK is from Bodek Inc., a long-established New York-based company. A range of its bagged, shredded salads are sold in Montreal.

Montreal-based entrepreneur Richard Groome took Cubic Farming commercial when he joined the company a couple of years ago and moved its headquarters to Montreal last year. Urban Barns opened in a rented facility in Mirabel in June which it announced as unique in the world.

He recently gave The CJN a tour.

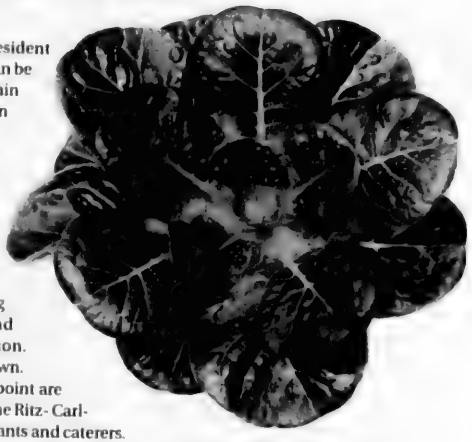
The company has so far acquired some 50 customers in Montreal and Toronto and, starting in January, in New York, the Gristedes supermarket chain in Manhattan is carrying its wares. Urban Barns plans to have its products in IGA and Sobeys stores in Canada in the coming months, and at a competitive price.

Groome, the firm's president and CEO, said produce can be picked and shipped within a 600-mile radius within a day.

In addition to lettuce, Urban Barns grows a variety of microgreens, seedlings of vegetables and herbs that are prized as garnishes. These are not kosher – but Groome is working with the Vaad to expand Urban Barns' certification. Herbs have also been grown.



A kosher red romaine from Urban Barns

Most customers at this point are high-end hotels, such as the Ritz-Carlton and Fairmont, restaurants and caterers. Clients of the Mada Community Centre, a kosher soup kitchen and hunger relief organization, have also enjoyed generous donations of produce from Urban Barns.

The company is working with McGill on other types of vegetables and fruits that can be grown in this eco-friendly, economical way. Testing by the university and an independent lab show the nutritional value of its products is actually superior to their conventionally grown counterparts, Groome said. They also grow faster and have a longer shelf life.

Cubic Farming can also keep prices competitive because of low overhead. Urban Barns has just eight employees.

The system is now in its third generation, and a fourth-generation prototype has been developed by local engineers that should greatly increase productivity, Groome said. The current iteration has a capacity to grow 19,000 plants per year per machine (Urban Barns currently has 13 operating). The next generation is projected to produce 126,000 plants per year – all within a 320,000-square foot footprint, Groome points out.

"This is an absolute revolution in agriculture," he says without any trace of hyperbole. "In the field, two lettuces can be grown per square foot in a year. In a greenhouse, it's 20 lettuces. With our current generation, we grow 120 plants. With the fourth generation, that will be up to nearly 300."

That's a current capacity of about 350,000 units per year. In addition to expanding production and broadening the types of vegetables and even fruit, Groome's long-term goal is to see the Cubic Farming system established worldwide, and he's scouting the U.S. tri-state area for a second "barn."

He will, not, however be licensing the technology; Urban Barns will own all facilities in order to control quality, he said. ■

Former OSC head was active in community

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Jack Geller, a leader in the Toronto Jewish community, a distinguished lawyer, and a loving husband, father and grandfather passed away at his home Jan. 7 at age 84.

Remembered for his grace, ethics and resilience, Geller was a trailblazer in both the Jewish and legal communities.

In 1959, he became the first Jewish lawyer to become a partner in an establishment Toronto firm, and what followed was an illustrious career first in private practice and as vice-chair and acting chair of the Ontario Securities Commission.

Geller was a beloved member of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple and served as its president from 1976 to 1978. He was named honorary life president in 1998.

He was born in Toronto in 1930 to parents who had emigrated from Poland. According to a 2010 interview conducted with Geller and his wife Sybil for the Law Society of Upper Canada "Diversifying the Bar: Lawyers Make History" project, Jack, who had two older sisters, first expressed wanting to be a lawyer as a child.

He attended Forest Hill Public School and Forest Hill Collegiate, and, in 1951, earned his undergraduate degree from the University of Toronto, where he was known as an excellent debater.

Geller met his wife Sybil in 1948, during his second week at U of T, where she was also studying. They met on the steps of the Royal Ontario Museum and, according to their daughter Dana, "When she saw him, she knew he was the one, and went after him."

They married two weeks after graduating.

Geller went on to study law at Osgoode Hall. Sybil worked as a secretary to put him through law school.

Despite graduating with distinction in 1955, he initially struggled to secure a position.

"There were no major non-Jewish firms at the time accepting Jews," his daughter, Dana Lampe, said. "His criteria was that he wanted to be at a major law firm. Religion didn't come into it."

Geller eventually found a place at the firm Campbell, Godfrey & Lewtas, where he worked for many years.

"Whatever his clients needed, he developed an expertise in it," his daughter said. "He had a brilliant analytical mind… but I think his real forte was his interactions with clients, advising them."

Though he frequently travelled during the week for work, he always made an effort to be home for Friday night dinner.

"When he was home with us, he'd read to us, tell us stories," she recalled.

"He always went to bat for us," daughter Jan Babins added.

In 1992, Geller retired from his practice and became vice-chair of the OSC. Five years later, he took on, until 2001, the position of acting chair.

His commitment to the Jewish community and to Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, which he joined at age 17, was evident throughout his life.

He and Sybil volunteered with groups such as Canadian Jewish Congress and regularly attended Friday night services at Holy Blossom.

"In all his many communal activities, nothing was as dear and rewarding to him as Holy Blossom Temple and what it stands for," said Rabbi Dow Marmur, rabbi emeritus at Holy Blossom.

"We learned from him not to sit on the sidelines," Geller's son Lawrence said. "And to do good… He wasn't fussed about how we chose to do it, but taught us to be mentors."

Jack Geller

After suffering a stroke in 2002, Geller developed aphasia and spent five years working tirelessly to regain his reading abilities. Though he was sometimes difficult to understand, Sybil interpreted for him.

He continued to participate in synagogue activities, such as board meetings.

"Everyone says they were blessed to have him in their lives," Lampe said. "We all feel touched by having known him."

Sybil, who has ALS and uses a computer to communicate, said what she'll miss most about her husband is "his presence."

Geller is survived by his wife Sybil and four children – Dana, Larry, Jan and Harold – as well as six grandchildren. ■

Five-year-old's project raised $19,000 for brother's illness

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Five-year-old Na'ama Uzan was bothered by the idea of doing nothing while funds are needed for research efforts to find a cure for Angelman syndrome, the neurogenetic disorder her older brother, Nadav, suffers from.

Last summer, determined to help raise money, Na'ama decided to have a lemonade stand for the cause, and her venture quickly snowballed into an extensive, community-wide fundraising initiative that has earned $19,000 to date. She now plans to raise more money with a hot chocolate stand on Jan. 29.

Na'ama's parents, Ruchama and David Uzan, said that last year, they told Na'ama about the scientific measures being taken to treat Angelman syndrome, which causes Nadav, 6, to have epilepsy, makes it difficult for him to sleep and affects his speech and balance.

"We'd been talking about different ways people raise money and mentioned as an example how she'd had a lemonade stand the summer before, for herself," Ruchama said. "And Na'ama said, 'OK, let's do [one] for this, too.' We let her lead us."

So last June, Na'ama set up a lemonade stand in front of the family's home in the Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue area of Toronto, selling lemonade for 50 cents a cup and popcorn. At the end of the day, she'd made $100.

The profits were directed to the U.S.-based Foundation for Angelman Syndrome Therapeutics (FAST), whose focus is to try to find a cure for the syndrome.

From that day, the initiative "took off way beyond our wildest beliefs," said David, who, like Ruchama, was "blown away" by their daughter's sense of initiative.

"It was important to me to do this because it's my brother who has [Angelman syndrome]," Na'ama said articulately over the phone. "His life is very, very, very hard."

News of Na'ama's lemonade stand rapidly spread among friends and acquaintances in the community, through both word of mouth and social media. Soon, others in the Jewish community were offering to host their own lemonade stands in support of the cause.

"It picked up to the point that once or twice a week, there would be a lemonade stand [to raise money for Angelman syndrome] in the area," David said. "People really took ownership."

The stands were usually held in or near the Uzans' neighbourhood, but some were further away. They typically happened on Sundays or on weekday afternoons, and featured lemonade and kosher baked goods, including challahs, all made by friends or donated by local businesses.

They were amazed by people's generosity. "People would say, 'I'll take a couple of lemonades,' and then put $20 in the jar," Ruchama recalled. "It was astounding. At one stand, we made $800."

Several family foundations pitched in, as did corporate sponsor Gamma-Dynacare Medical Laboratories.

Home Depot also helped, donating wood to build sturdier lemonade stands. Then a local builder helped construct them and a group of neighbourhood children decorated them.

On Jan. 29, fundraising will resume: from 3:30 to 4:30 p.m., Na'ama will sell hot chocolate, coffee donated by Starbucks and various types of baked goods outside her family's home.

"We're obviously really proud of Na'ama's sensitivity," Ruchama said. "This has tumbled into something so enormous… When I was five, I wasn't doing anything like this!"

David also expressed awe at their daughter's accomplishments, saying, "Everything, from Na'ama's understanding, to her initiative, to her love of her brother, to her drive and articulateness – we're just in disbelief."

To participate in or donate to the hot chocolate stand, contact the Uzan family at aslemonadestand@gmail.com.

GUEST VOICE

'He was controlling right from the beginning'

LISA HOFFMAN*
SPECIAL TOTHE CJN

Our story began on a blind date. I was 20 years old and he was 26. What I now identify as abuse started early in our relationship. It was emotional and subtle. He would tell me that I looked "too Jewish" and comment on my short hair and weight. I wanted to be acceptable to him, so I started to diet, grew my hair and dressed to his style.

He was very controlling right from the beginning, making all the decisions of what we would do, where we would go and who we would see. I began to try things with him that I had never done before. Our relationship was on and off for two years until we got engaged. I got pregnant while we were planning our wedding. I was 23 years old.

We lived an extremely insulated life. He did not want me to work, and I did not have a car, so I became completely dependent on him. After our baby was born, his need to control intensified. He did the laundry and shopping, managed the money and made all the decisions about our life together. I was responsible for looking after the baby, but he was very clear in his expectations of how he wanted things done.

Visitors were minimal, because he didn't want germs in the house. My family and friends were only allowed to come over when he was at work. We did not leave our baby with anyone, as he trusted few. He controlled everything and told me that I was not capable. I believed him. Our physical relationship was also dictated by him.

There was no questioning him, as he believed that he was always right. I was afraid to challenge him.

After many years, I was finally allowed a car. He would threaten to remove the starter cable if I wanted to go somewhere that he didn't agree to. The car was for driving the kids (we had three by then) and shopping for the house. He controlled the money and gave me enough for groceries and if the children needed something. He expected dinner to be on the table at a certain time, and if the children started acting up, he would say that he did not want to eat with them. He was very harsh and blunt with his words and expectations. His behaviour was often threatening, however the abuse was never physical. He was overly protective and attentive to the children and very controlling with them as well.

> He would threaten to remove the [car's] starter cable if I wanted to go somewhere that he didn't agree to

I never identified my marriage as abusive, because it was what I had seen growing up in a Jewish home where verbal and emotional abuse happened every day and physical abuse often became a reality. This was my "normal" Jewish household with my parents and in my marriage. I think that I knew deep down that it wasn't. Nobody ever talked about it, and I didn't tell anyone about what I was living in my marriage, because at that point I hadn't named it. Abuse didn't happen in the Jewish community, and it was never discussed.

Later, after I left him, I found out that many people were aware that something was not right. Many years later, his mother told my daughter that she understood why I left.

The catalyst to my leaving was when my daughter started to act as a referee between us. This was the behaviour that I used with my parents, and I realized that I was watching my life replay. I was becoming more aware that my children were not seeing and learning healthy things from our relationship. I have always said that the greatest gift I gave my children was leaving their father, because this empowered them as well.

When I decided to leave, I didn't know where I would go, what I would have or how I would live because he controlled everything. What I did know was that I had to save my soul. I began to realize that I was not isolated and alone and that there was lots of support available once I became open to accepting it. I began to own my choices and stand proud in who I am without apologizing.

I took back my voice and found the person I had lost so many years before. ■

Community needs to talk about domestic abuse

Krowitz said the general feeling on abuse is that it happens to somebody else.

"The image people have is that it happens to a family that is quite poor, uneducated, heavy drinking, drug use – that's the family that has abuse going on in the relationship, so people are shocked to learn that there are no socio-economic barriers," she explained.

"One of the myths is that all Jewish families are loving, nurturing and harmonious... I'll say something very unpopular – shalom bayit is a double-edged sword. When you have it in your home it is wonderful, and that's what we strive for, but sometimes it becomes a barrier for a woman, because she is ashamed that her home is not a place of peace and she feels like it is her fault."

She said one of the biggest barriers to seeking help is the concept of the situation being a shandeh – "the shame of admitting, disclosing, that your home is not a happy place. That your husband doesn't treat you well, that you are frightened, that you walk on eggshells."

Krowitz said the community needs to talk freely about the issue.

"I think we have to talk about it and break down the shame and recognize that... everyone has the right to live in a peaceful, content life and be mutually respected." ■

Domestic abuse checklist

The best way to help the community acknowledge that domestic abuse does occur in the Jewish community is to shatter myths about what abuse is and is not, and to educate people that abuse is not limited to physical abuse, which can include slapping, grabbing, pinching, punching, kicking, shoving or dragging.

You may be in an abusive relationship if your partner:

- Embarrasses, calls you names and puts you down in public
- Uses intimidation, anger or threats to get his way
- Makes you feel helpless and dependent
- Does all the decision-making
- Controls and withholds money
- Denies access to medical treatment or services
- Calls you repeatedly or shows up unannounced to make sure you are where you said you would be
- Checks cellphones, emails or social networks without permission
- Exhibits extreme jealousy, insecurity and erratic mood swings
- Makes false accusations
- Blames you, drugs or alcohol for saying hurtful things or physically abusing you
- Pressures you into sex acts you're not comfortable with
- Isolates you from friends or family
- Doesn't treat you as an equal partner
- Threatens to keep your children from you

Baird remains committed to Israel/PA

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, JERUSALEM

After a hostile greeting by protesters in the Palestinian Authority capital of Ramallah, who pelted his convoy with shoes and eggs, Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird returned to Jerusalem to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman and President Reuven Rivlin.

According to reports, Ramallah activists carried signs reading "Baird you are not welcome in Palestine." Baird has opposed the PA's bid for war crimes charges against Israel and other aggressive moves by the PA at the United Nations. Ottawa has also been vocally supportive of Israel under Prime Minister Stephen Harper's tenure.

Baird's visit came on the anniversary of Harper's landmark tour of the region in 2014. Baird hoped to reaffirm Canada's commitment to the strategic partnership and agreements forged on that visit. "Canada deeply values its close ties with Israel," Baird said prior to his trip.

Baird travelled to Ramallah Sunday morning to meet with PA Foreign Minister Riad Malki. At that meeting, which Baird called "cordial and constructive," Baird and Malki discussed Canada's "desire for a future of peace and prosperity, stability and security for both Palestinians and Israelis."

Baird said Canada considers itself a "friend" to both Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

"As friends, we have candid and frank exchanges on areas where we differ in opinion." Baird said he asked Malki to "strongly reconsider the consequences of moving forward with any action that may be counterproductive to a negotiated solution with the State of Israel."

Last week, the PA brought war crimes charges against Israel at the International Criminal Court in The Hague, along with ongoing efforts to seek sanctions at the UN. Baird said these moves, "will not contribute to peace and security in the region."

As Canadians, said Baird, "we strongly support Israel's right to defend itself, and we will play our part to defend Israel from international attempts to delegitimize it."

"Canada believes strongly in a two-state solution between Israel and the Palestinian Authority," Baird said prior to the trip. "Negotiations provide the only viable path to lasting peace."

Returning from Ramallah Sunday afternoon, Baird met privately with Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman.

Liberman has earned notoriety with his plan to annex Israeli Arab villages to the PA. Under Liberman's plan, only those Arabs who moved to Israeli-controlled areas and pledged loyalty to the State of Israel would retain their current citizenship. Once considered a contender for prime minister, Liberman's chances have been diminished considerably by recent corruption allegations.

The ministers jointly signed four memoranda of understanding and agreements, including a declaration of solidarity and friendship, and a declaration on trade that Baird said aims "to double the value of our [countries'] commercial relationship."

Baird said that with the rise of worldwide terrorism, including October's attack on the Parliament buildings in Ottawa, "the relationship between Canada and Israel is stronger than its ever been, and getting stronger every day."

Business development between the two countries will be targeted specifically in the area of defence, security and cyber security, Baird said.

Canadian Ambassador Vivian Bercovici and other official representatives from both countries remained after Baird's departure for award presentations to the 10 finalists of Grand Challenges Israel (GCI). Inspired by Grand Challenges Canada (GCC), which is led by CEO Peter Singer, who received the Order of Canada in 2011, GCI rewards entrepreneurs for advances in affordable health care for the developing world. Finalists, chosen from more than 100 entries, presented innovations in water purification, disease diagnosis and an affordable wheelchair for children. Worldwide, the Grand Challenges initiative was launched by the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation in 2003.

Baird's trip to the region included a stop in Egypt, which Baird visited prior to the Israel leg of his trip.

There, he met with Foreign Minister Sameh Shoukry but failed to ensure the release of Canadian-Egyptian journalist Mohamed Fahmy, convicted for being a member of the Muslim Brotherhood organization, which is banned in Egypt.

A year ago, on Jan. 20, Harper became the first Canadian prime minister to speak in the Knesset. His remarks about Israel's right to exist and defend itself received a standing ovation, along with jeers and catcalls from Israeli Arab MKs who stormed out in protest. On that visit, Harper pledged millions of dollars in increased support for the Palestinian Authority.

Although Harper's visit was well received by the Israeli media, the Canadian press was critical of Harper's large delegation and "rigid" pro-Israel stance.

Baird's Israel agenda originally included stops at the Dome of the Rock and the Al-Aqsa Mosque, both atop the hotly debated Temple Mount area behind the Western Wall in Jerusalem. No reason was given for the decision to cancel visits there. Harper cancelled a similar visit a year ago.

Baird met Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Monday afternoon before leaving Israel Jan.20. He was to continue on to Davos, Switzerland, to attend the 2015 World Economic Forum from Jan. 21 to 24. ■

Argentine special prosecutor found dead of gunshot wound

JTA
BUENOS AIRES

Argentine Special Prosecutor Alberto Nisman was found dead hours before he was to meet with lawmakers regarding the AMIA Jewish centre bombing case.

Nisman, 51, was found dead in the bathroom of his apartment in the Buenos Aires City neighbourhood of Puerto Madero early Monday morning.

Nisman was to have a closed-door meeting with congressional lawmakers, in which he was expected to reveal details of his allegations against President Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner and Foreign Minister Hector Timerman for their alleged cover up of Iran's role in the 1994 bombing, which killed 85 and injured hundreds.

According to Nisman's accusations, contained in a lawsuit filed last week in federal court, Fernandez covered up for former Iranian officials accused of involvement in the attack. Timerman, who is Jewish, also was named in the lawsuit, which seeks a freeze on Fernandez's assets.

Nisman was found dead from a gunshot wound from a 22-caliber pistol. No other details have been revealed. ■

Netanyahu plans to discredit ICC probe

JUSTIN JALIL
JERUSALEM

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu plans to launch a campaign to discredit the legitimacy of the International Criminal Court, following its announcement that it would pursue a war crimes probe against Israel over the summer war in Gaza, Israeli sources said Sunday.

Netanyahu convened a meeting of legal advisers and other officials to hash out an Israeli response to the ICC move, a source in the Prime Minister's Office said.

Earlier, Netanyahu derided The Hague-based body's decision and vowed to fight it.

Chief ICC prosecutor Fatou Bensouda opened a preliminary investigation on July 16 in order to examine if war crimes were committed by Israel, the Palestinians or both in the lead-up to, and during, Operation Protective Edge, last summer's 50-day conflict between the Israel Defence Forces and various groups in Gaza.

Netanyahu met with security officials and legal experts, concluding that it was necessary to thwart any attempt by the court to prosecute Israel for defending itself against terrorism.

The group will work to discredit the legitimacy of the international tribunal, as the Palestinian Authority is not a state and technically unable to file a case against Israel in the ICC, said the PMO source, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The panel also expressed disappointment over the hypocritical nature of the ICC, accusing The Hague of being biased against Israel and stating that the probe would harm the global effort to fight terror.

Israeli and American officials have been harshly critical of the ICC move since the Jan. 16 decision.

"The decision by the prosecutor at the International Criminal Court to begin an inquiry against the State of Israel is the height of hypocrisy and the opposite of justice," Netanyahu said at the start of the cabinet meeting Sunday morning. "I have already encountered such phenomena during my years of public service representing the State of Israel both as ambassador to the UN and as prime minister, but this decision by the prosecutor is in a category of its own. It gives legitimacy to international terrorism.

"We will fight it in every way possible and we will also recruit others to fight this absurdity, and they are already being recruited. We will not allow Israel Defence Forces soldiers to face international tribunals.

"I would also like to say that these steps will not deter us from doing what is necessary to defend the State of Israel and its citizens," Netanyahu added.

He also slammed the investigation the day before, claiming the ICC was subverting its own "lofty goals," which were to prevent the repetition of history's worst crimes, including the Holocaust.

"The court was founded to prevent a repeat of history's worst crimes, foremost among them the genocide of six million Jews," he said. "Now the Palestinians are cynically manipulating the ICC to deny the Jewish state the right to defend itself against the very war crimes and the very terror that the court was established to prevent."

Earlier, Hamas welcomed the ICC decision to probe Israel, saying it would provide the tribunal with evidence to aid the investigation. "What is needed now is to quickly take practical steps in this direction, and we are ready to provide [the court] with thousands of reports and documents that confirm the Zionist enemy has committed horrible crimes against Gaza and against our people," Hamas spokesperson Fawzi Barhoum said.

Prosecutors in The Hague said preliminary examination would review "in full independence and impartiality" alleged crimes committed since June 13 last year, the beginning of tensions between the two sides that culminated in the summer conflict, which resulted in the deaths of some 2,200 Palestinians, according to Hamas figures, and 72 people on the Israeli side.

Potential cases ICC prosecutor Fatou Bensouda could take on include allegations of war crimes by Israel during last summer's Gaza war, where the Palestinians suffered heavy civilian casualties. Israel's settlement construction on land claimed by the Palestinians could also be examined. The cases could also include alleged war crimes by Hamas, the Islamist group that controls Gaza, including the firing of thousands of rockets at Israeli residential areas from crowded neighbourhoods.

The prosecutor's announcement came after the PA acceded to the Hague-based court's founding treaty and recognized its jurisdiction dating back to July, before the last Gaza war. That move opened the door to an ICC investigation that could target possible crimes by both Israel, which is not a member of the court, and the Palestinians.

"A preliminary examination is not an investigation, but a process of examining the information available in order to reach a fully informed determination on whether there is a reasonable basis to proceed with a [full] investigation," Bensouda said.

Depending on her findings, Bensouda will decide whether to launch or quash the investigation, based on the initial probe. ■

Hezbollah vows retaliation for airstrike

STUART WINER
JERUSALEM

Sources in Hezbollah said on Monday that retaliation for an alleged Israeli airstrike that killed several of its members was inevitable, but would be restrained enough to not provoke a war.

The Lebanese daily As-Safir, which is identified with Hezbollah, cited sources close to the Shiite terror group as saying that it would choose a time and place to hit back, but would do so in a manner that would not cause an escalation in the conflict.

At least six Hezbollah members, including a senior commander, were killed in an Israeli helicopter strike in the Syrian Golan Heights on Jan. 18, according to sources close to the terror group.

Among the dead was Jihad Mughniyeh, the son of Imad Mughniyeh, a senior Hezbollah commander killed in Damascus in 2008, allegedly by Israel. Jihad Mughniyeh had been serving as the Shiite terrorist group's Golan District commander, western sources said.

The attack would "draw a painful and unexpected response, but we can assume that it will be controlled and beneath the level that could escalate into all-out war," the Hezbollah sources told As-Safir, and recalled a roadside bomb attack in October 2014 that injured two IDF soldiers.

At the time, Hezbollah claimed the bombing was revenge for the killing of one of its members, Hussein Ali Haidar, in a Sept. 5 explosion that Lebanese officials claimed was caused when Israel destroyed one of its own surveillance devices that had been uncovered inside Lebanon.

"Even though Hezbollah doesn't intend to up the ante, the organization is planning for a worst-case scenario in which Israel decides to venture into Lebanon," the Hezbollah sources were quoted as saying.

Meanwhile Ibrahim al-Amin, editor of the Al Akhbar newspaper, which is also closely associated with Hezbollah, published an editorial in which he "envisioned" a meticulously planned response rather than a knee-jerk reaction.

"Special considerations caused the enemy leadership [Israel] to take the decision to carry out the crime yesterday," he wrote. Hezbollah's response, he said, "should be an act that isn't based on emotion, but on considerations that go down to the finest details, an action that demands quiet and consideration, without any connection to the emotional aspect."

The strike against the Hezbollah activists also drew censure from the organization's patron, Iran.

Although there was no official confirmation that Israel was behind the attack, an unnamed Israeli security source told AFP that an Israeli helicopter had conducted a strike against "terrorists" near Quneitra, on the Syrian side of the Golan Heights.

Mughniyeh was killed along with five others as they patrolled near the Syrian town. Reuters, citing a western intelligence source, said that Mughniyeh was the commander of Hezbollah forces in the Golan Heights and Syria and that he had prepared numerous attacks on Israel, including some that were carried out.

With the backing of Syria and Iran, Mughniyeh had overseen Hezbollah's presence on the Golan Heights and planned significant assaults on Israel using artillery rockets, anti-tank weapons, improvised explosive devices along the border, anti-aircraft weapons, and cross-border incursions against Israel Defence Forces soldiers and Israeli civilians, Ha'aretz reported, citing western intelligence sources.

As the son of slain Hezbollah terror chief Imad Mughniyeh, and with close personal connections to Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah and the commander of the Iranian Republican Guard's special forces unit, Qassem Soleimani, Jihad Mughniyeh was known as "the Prince" within the Lebanese terror organization. ■

I am woman, hear me roar (but not in politics)

Zohar Mandel

Israel started 2015 with a sense of hope. After a summer spent in bomb shelters, and watching our teenage soldiers fighting in Gaza, our government has dissolved itself and we're heading toward an election. Over the next few weeks, every newsroom will be full of anchors, spokespeople, former politicians and experts who will try to convince the Israeli public that this time, the election matters. And it does. This time, awareness of female representation in the Knesset is at an all-time high.

Israel is well known for its large number of political parties – more than 15 ran in the last election – and they focus on a wide range of issues. However, when it comes to gender equality, there's an unspoken problem. Not only were women poorly represented in the previous Knesset – at 27 out of 120 members – but there are ultra-Orthodox parties that forbid women from running as part of their electoral lists. The other parties, meanwhile, depend on an age-old excuse: because of Israel's security issues, we need security experts and former military commanders to represent us. Therefore, if we promise seats to women, it will be at the expense of someone who might have the knowledge to make this country better and safer for our children.

In the past, Israel had its feminist moments of glory.

Arguing against the under-representation of women, many point to the "Golda story" as one of Israel's proudest moments. Most people in Israel don't know much about Golda Meir or what she believed in, but they take pride in the fact that from 1969 to 1974, Israel had a female prime minister, making it one of a handful countries in the world to have elected a woman to its highest office. This argument is worn out, and it's used every time someone argues that women are under-represented in Israeli politics and that the Knesset is run by an old boys club.

Then along came Tzipi Livni. It doesn't matter if you're right-wing or left-wing. It doesn't matter if you agree or disagree with her politics. After listening to the Golda story for so many years, Livni offers voters an opportunity: she's a real candidate, not just a pretty placeholder, who dares to challenge the system and who has inspired us all with the real hope of having a woman as prime minister once again.

Don't get me wrong. I'm not asking anyone to vote for her just because she's a woman. On the contrary: I'm asking you to close your eyes, listen and give her a fair chance.

I'm asking the people of Israel, who are used to only voting for generals or veterans, to stop and listen to a woman. Women make up more than half of our population. There's no reason that they should not make up more of our elected officials. I'm asking news producers to make sure women are invited to speak on panels, give their opinions, raise issues and fight for what's right. I'm asking the Israeli public to make sure this election is about real issues that affect our society and economy, and not just a macho ego fight about who gets to run this country.

> Make sure this election is about real issues that affect our society and economy, and not just a macho ego fight about who gets to run the country

The upcoming election affects us all, and there are real issues at stake. It's a real opportunity to make history once again.

It's time for women to roar. ■

Paris march 'for Charlie, not for the Jews'

CNAAN LIPSHIZ

As he marched through Paris with some 1.5 million people, Philippe Schmidt felt he was experiencing a "beautiful moment of unity."

For Schmidt, a Jewish human rights lawyer and vice-president of the International League Against Racism and Anti-Semitism, the so-called Republican March on Jan. 11 was "a sign of popular mobilization against extremism" following three attacks this month by Islamists in the Paris region that killed 12 at the offices of a satirical weekly, a police officer on the street and four Jews at a kosher supermarket.

French President Francois Hollande and dozens of world leaders, including Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, attended the rally in commemoration of all 17 victims that drew a record number of demonstrators.

Yet in Schmidt's estimation, most of the people marching "were there for Charlie, not for the Jews," he said, in reference to the killings at the offices of Charlie Hebdo, a magazine targeted for its satirical cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad.

His opinion is shared by many French Jews who, despite supporting the massive response to the attacks, doubt it will help curb rising anti-Semitic violence.

"I hope the response heralds a change in the indifference to anti-Semitism, but I am also aware that no such response came when only Jews were targeted," Schmidt noted in reference to the murder of four in 2012 at a Jewish school in Toulouse by another Islamist, Mohammed Merah. Three children were among the victims.

"There was no Republican March or anything comparable after Toulouse," he said.

Some prominent French Jewish figures boycotted the march because it was co-organized by far-left organizations that they hold responsible for promoting anti-Semitic violence.

"Some of the people walking today are the same people who walked against Israel last summer," said Philippe Karsenty, the deputy mayor of the Paris suburb of Neuilly-sur-Seine, in reference to anti-Semitic violence during protests against Israel's war with Hamas in Gaza. "This is completely hypocritical."

Many of the marchers who carried "I am Charlie" signs "would never carry a sign reading 'I am Jewish' or 'I am Hyper Cacher,'" he said, in reference to the supermarket that was attacked.

A vigil the night before outside Hyper Cacher drew approximately 2,000 people and featured hundreds of Israeli flags and the spontaneous singing of Hatikvah.

"Look around. There are almost only Jews here," said Serge Bitton, a resident of the Paris suburb of Saint-Mande. "The absence of non-Jews tells you everything you need to know about how French society feels about the attacks on our community."

CRIF, the umbrella group of French Jewish communities, and the Union of French Jewish Students of France, (UEJF), called on members to attend the march on Jan. 11.

But the leaders of the National Bureau for Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism stayed away for reasons similar to the ones expressed by Karsenty.

By contrast, France's chief rabbi, Haim Korsia, spoke of the march and the hundreds of smaller gatherings and walks organized elsewhere in France as a possible turning point. He has long complained of indifference to anti-Semitism in French society.

"This time, French society has done its duty," Rabbi Korsia said at a memorial ceremony for the 17 victims on Jan.11 at the Grand Synagogue here. "Often we asked, 'Where is France? Where are the French?' We feel isolated. Well, today, on this historical day for France, we felt this fraternity."

While many French Jews doubt that their society cares as such about anti-Semitism, they are less skeptical about the government's stance.

Hours after the hostage taking and killings at Hyper Cacher, Hollande called it an anti-Semitic attack. He and Prime Minister Manuel Valls both attended the memorial service at the Grand Synagogue, and Valls also came to the vigil outside the supermarket, along with Paris Mayor Anne Hidalgo.

During an address Jan. 13 before the National Assembly, the French parliament's lower house, Valls, whom many French Jews regard as something of a hero, reiterated his trademark assertion that without its Jews, "France will no longer be France."

To Schmidt, the Valls speech and Hollande's attendance at the synagogue "were very powerful symbols of support."

Bitton, the Jewish resident of Saint-Mande, said he was very grateful for the government's support. But, he added, "the government of France is not France."

"It changes every few years," he said. "The anti-Semitism stays put." ■

Israeli security forces bust Galilee IS cell

MITCH GINSBURG
JERUSALEM

Israeli security forces arrested seven Arab citizens of Israel who had sworn allegiance to the Islamic State(IS), were actively planning to join the Salafist jihadi group in Syria and were plotting to carry out attacks in Israel, including against the Arab Druze minority, the Shin Bet said Sunday.

The men, all from the Galilee region of Israel, were indicted Jan.18 on several counts, including membership in an illegal organization, IS, which was declared illegal in September. The police and Shin Bet conducted the arrests and subsequent interrogations during November and December.

The discovery of the cell and the foiling of a plot to acquire weapons and shoot Druze citizens of Israel, who are considered infidels by the adherents of Salafist Sunni Islam, "points to a dangerous escalation among Israeli Arabs," the Shin Bet said.

The central member of the Galilee cell was identified as Adnan Ala a-Din, a 40-year-old lawyer from Nazareth, who, the Shin Bet charged, presented himself to the other members of the group as a "senior and official IS officer in Palestine."

A-Din allegedly preached Islamist ideology to the other members of the group, advocated strongly in favour of terror attacks against Israeli civilians, and had the members slaughter sheep in order to steel themselves and "prepare their souls" for the rigours of jihad.

Another alleged central figure was Karim Abu Salah, 22, of Sakhnin, who was arrested in July 2014 at Ben-Gurion International Airport on his way to Syria. From prison, the Shin Bet alleged, Abu Salah sought to organize strikes against Israeli military targets and against Druze citizens of Israel.

The group would convene regularly for religious lessons, studying under an unnamed religious leader in the north of Israel, and maintaining contacts with Islamic State fighters in Syria, including several Arab citizens of Israel.

Additionally, on Nov. 20, the Shin Bet and the Israel Police arrested Omar Musa Abu Kush, a doctor who had recently graduated from the Jordan University of Science and Technology's Faculty of Medicine.

In custody, Abu Kush, an Israeli citizen from the Bedouin village of Arara, admitted to supporting the Islamic State and to having met with IS activists in Jordan. His intention was to travel to Syria to join the ranks of the organization, which has led the battle against Syrian President Bashar Assad's regime and brutalized local populations, killing men who do not adhere to the organization's interpretation of Islam and forcing women into servitude.

Abu Kush apparently planned to follow in the footsteps of Dr. Othman Abu Alkayan, another Bedouin citizen of Israel, from the nearby village of Hura, who had worked as a resident at Barzilai Hospital in Ashkelon before joining the Islamic State in Syria, where he was killed in battle in August.

Both men, Abu Kush and Abu Alkayan, were exposed to the Islamic State's radical ideology on academic campuses in Jordan. Abu Kush has been indicted for contact with a foreign agent, support of a terrorist organization, and promotion for an illegal organization. ■

Zach Hyman
MICHIGAN ATHLETICS PHOTOS

Zach Hyman in the running for top U.S. college award

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

It took Zach Hyman a little while to get acclimatized to the NCAA (National Collegiate Athletic Association) and make his presence felt.

With press clippings galore from his time in Junior A hockey with the Hamilton Red Wings – he was RBC Canadian Junior Hockey Player of the Year in 2011 – he didn't exactly set the league on fire in his freshman and sophomore seasons. It wasn't until his third, junior, year with the University of Michigan Wolverines that he started to make an impact. And then, look out!

Now in his senior year, he's having a breakout season that is seeing him play on the team's top line, lead the team in scoring, receive player of the week awards and become one of the top three candidates to win the Hobey Baker Award, given to the top college player in the United States.

Oh, and the 2010 Florida Panthers draftee (fifth round, 123rd overall) is likely to turn pro next season.

Not a bad year. Not at all.

To his credit, Hyman, 22, doesn't want to look that far ahead. Contacted by phone in Ann Arbor, home of the Wolverines, he said he is not focusing on what the future might hold.

"I'm thinking more about the season and helping Michigan do well," he said.

If the future doesn't interest the native of Toronto, let's look at the present. Hyman, who's played centre and right wing, recently led Michigan to a two-game weekend sweep over the ninth-ranked Minnesota Gophers. He tallied six points in two games, including a goal and three assists in the Wolverine's 4-3 overtime victory. The next night he added another goal and one helper to help complete the sweep.

That performance left him atop the Big Ten in scoring and fifth in the nation, with 26 points, or 1.37 points per game. He then received his second career Big Ten star of the week award.

Earlier this season, Hyman, who stands six foot two and weighs 205 pounds, enjoyed a five-point night (3 goals, 2 assists), including a natural hat trick, against UMass-Lowell.

Pressed to recount a season highlight, Hyman conceded he felt pretty good notching the game-winning goals against rivals Michigan State and Michigan Tech in the GLI Championship in late December.

In 19 games he leads the Wolverines in scoring with 11 goals and 15 assists, is plus-12 and has three game winners.

No doubt those performances account for the massive support he's been getting in voting for the Hobey Baker Memorial Award, given to the player voted most outstanding in U.S. college hockey. He's near the top with more than 28,200 votes (anyone can vote online at this stage), well ahead of Boston College's Jack Eichel, touted to be one of this year's top two NHL entry draft picks.

Hyman, a graduate of the Robbins Hebrew Academy and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, admits his success was slow in coming. It took him until the middle of his third year before things started to change for him.

"I had a good finish to my year," he said. "I finished really strong."

That boosted his confidence, and when you put that together with improvements in his skating, puck handling and shot, the results have been seen on the score sheet this year.

He sees himself as not just the go-to guy when it comes to scoring or setting up his linemates, Dylan Larkin and Alex Kile, but as a 200-foot player, responsible at both ends of the ice.

His coach, Red Berenson, agrees.

"He's a senior now and he's become one of our best players over four years," Berenson said. "His game has really come to the fore this year. He's a leader and is leading in points. He scores huge goals. When the team needs a lift, Zach is the guy who gives it to us."

Berenson said he can rely on Hyman in all situations, including the power play and penalty killing.

Hyman's progress did not come overnight, the coach continued. "I think it's been a gradual process."

When he came to the Wolverines, "he was a good junior player, but not necessarily a good college player," Berenson said.

"He came to us with a lot of press clippings, and people expected he'd be ready to make an impact, but it never happened. He did not quit working or stop being a good teammate. He kept evolving. He became stronger, faster and had more confidence. Puck luck followed him."

Hyman, one of three Jewish players on the Wolverines along with Americans Justin Selman and Steve Racine, has attended the Panthers' rookie camp, which no doubt helped in his development. While both Hyman and Berenson are hesitant to look too far ahead, the legendary coach said Hyman is definitely a pro prospect.

"He could play in the American [Hockey] League tomorrow," Berenson said.

As for the NHL, it would depend on the role expected of him. It's tough to predict a college player's future, but his former teammate, Luke Glendening, was not the scorer Hyman is. Still, through hard work, he developed into a useful contributor to the Detroit Red Wings on their fourth line, Berenson said.

Modest to a fault, Hyman said a pro career is something he'll consider. "I feel physically and mentally ready," he said. "After this year, obviously I'll try my hand at the next level." ■

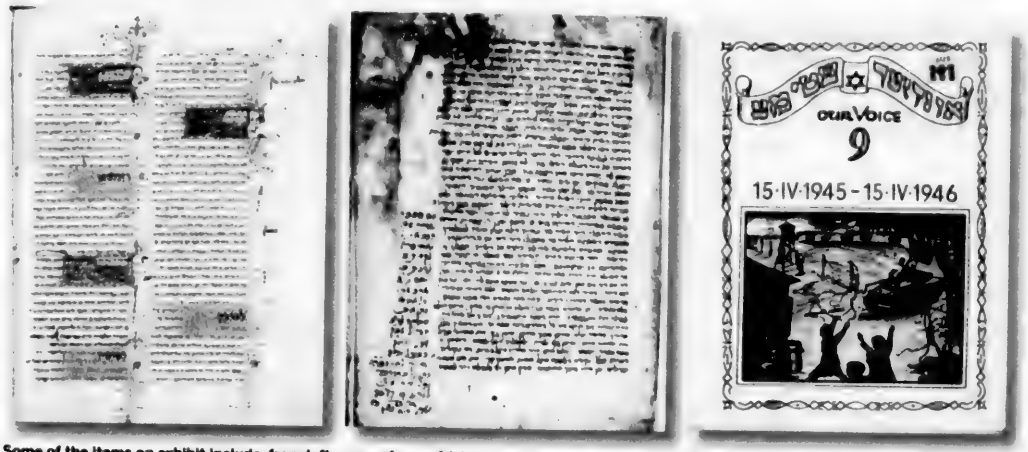
U of T library hosts Judaica exhibit

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



Some of the items on exhibit include, from left, a page from a 14th-century manuscript of the Sefer Mitsvot Gadol by Moses ben Jacob of Coucy; the first page of the 15th-century Zohar belonging to Shabbetai Tsvi and Under Shtime, the first Yiddish publication for Holocaust survivors.

A Middle Eastern Torah dating from the 10th to 12th century, a 14th-century Torah commentary by Rashi, and an early 15th-century manuscript of the Zohar that once belonged to the false Jewish messiah Shabbetai Tsvi are among the pieces on display in an exhibition of Judaica that opens Jan. 26 at the University of Toronto's Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library.

About a third of the 110 items in "As It Is Written: Judaic Treasures from the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library" come from the Friedberg Collection, donated to the library by Toronto financier Albert Friedberg and his wife Nancy in several instalments beginning in 1995, and credited with putting the library on the map as a major repository of rare Judaica.

Other items come from a collection of rare Hebraica donated to the university from the estate of the late Toronto Rabbi Abraham Price; from the Schneid Collection of Jewish Art, donated from the estate of artist and art historian Otto Schneid; and from the Druck Collection of kibbutz and secular Haggadot published from the 1930s to the 1980s.

The exhibition also includes a tribute album dedicated to Sir Moses Montefiore on the occasion of his 100th birthday in 1884; photos of Chinese Jews taken by Bishop William Charles White; and a collection of rare postcards of about 120 pre-World War II synagogues from all over Europe, many of which were destroyed.

According to the catalogue by curator Barry Walfish, the exhibition "takes visitors through more than a thousand years of Jewish history and culture." A specialist in Judaica who earned a PhD in medieval Jewish intellectual history and medieval interpretation of the Bible, Walfish began working as a Judaica specialist for the Robarts Library in 1980 and for the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library in 1991.

"In putting this exhibition together, I discovered a lot of things I hadn't known about before – it's been quite an adventure for me," he said. "I tried to include items from the most important collections that we have, but I had to be quite selective because our exhibition space is quite restricted."

Still, the scope of the exhibition is impressive. Seeking a Canadian connection, Walfish included a display case of Canadiana from the 18th century to the present. The oldest item, a 1752 broadsheet listing goods offered by the Jewish merchants Nathans and Hart, is "one of the first items printed in Canada as well as clear evidence of a Jewish presence in Halifax almost from the time of its founding."

There is also an 1878 prayerbook edited by Montreal Rabbi Abraham de Sola; a mystical treatise about the Golem of Prague written in 1909 by Rabbi Judah Yudl Rozenberg of Toronto and Montreal; a volume of poetry by Montrealer Y. I. Segal published in 1921 and regarded as the first book of Yiddish poetry printed in Canada; and a wartime Yiddish pamphlet titled "In Battle against Anti-Semitism" by communist-socialist politician J. B. Salsberg of Toronto. ■

"As It Is Written: Judaic Treasures from the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library" is on view at the library, 120 St. George St. at Harbord, from Jan. 26 to May 1. Consult the library website or phone 416-978-5285 for visiting hours.

Continuing the tradition of engaging with Maimonides

MARTIN LOCKSHIN

If we did not have good evidence that there was only one man named Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon (Maimonides or Rambam, 1138-1204), it would be tempting to think that there were two, or even more. Some of his works display an unrivalled mastery of rabbinic literature; others, mastery of Greek and Muslim philosophy. In addition, he produced voluminous medical writings.

No individual Jewish author had a greater effect on later generations than Maimonides. New scholarly books about him appear all the time, and they have to take a stand on who the "real Maimonides" was, the halachist, the philosopher or the doctor.

James A. Diamond holds the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Chair in Jewish Studies at the University of Waterloo. Maimonides and the Shaping of the Jewish Canon is his third book about Maimonides, yet he has still found new and worthwhile questions to investigate. Diamond is very familiar with the argument that Maimonides was a neo-Aristotelian in Jewish clothing. But the opening chapters of his book build a strong case for the Jewishness of Maimonides' thought. Diamond also provides a learned analysis of what Maimonides meant when he talked about the love of God. Maimonides argued that such love could be achieved only through philosophical inquiry, and that it was superior to the fear of God, the only purpose of which was to scare the unphilosophical masses into proper behaviour.

These chapters set the stage for the rest of the book, which exemplifies a relatively new field of study, "reception history," in other words, how Maimonides' thought was "received," i.e. accepted, rejected, appropriated, misappropriated, modified and/or twisted by later generations. Each of the eight chapters in this section concentrates on one great Jewish thinker who grappled with Maimonides' thought, from the "assault" (as Diamond calls it) launched against him by the kabbalist Rabbi Moses ben Nahman (Ramban or Nahmanides, 1194-1270) to the "reinvention of Maimonides' legal code" by Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook (1865-1935), the first chief rabbi of the modern Jewish community in Israel in the 20th century. Diamond deals mostly with the reception of Maimonides by rabbis, but he also includes two less traditional Jews, Benedict Spinoza (1632-1677) and Hermann Cohen (1842-1918).

The book will be of major interest to academics, but any Jew who studies and struggles with Maimonides' thought will find it a compelling read. To give an idea of Diamond's interesting findings, I will concentrate on the chapter about Rabbi Kook and Maimonides.

It is hard to imagine two more different interpreters of traditional Judaism than Maimonides, the medieval arch-rationalist, and Rabbi Kook, the post-chassidic creative mystical thinker. Yet Rabbi Kook never explicitly opposes Maimonides' approach, he just "reinterprets" it. Diamond leads us through a number of such reinterpretations, drawing heavily on materials, published only recently, that Rabbi Kook left in manuscript form.

Rabbi Kook argued that when Maimonides claimed that love of God was superior to fear of God, he was only denigrating the type of fear of God that people have in their early stages of spiritual development. Rabbi Kook believed that the initiated could achieve a type of fear of God that was, in fact, superior, and that they could use the love of God as a stepping stone to bring them there. Thus Rabbi Kook essentially turns Maimonides around 180 degrees.

Diamond also shows how oddly Rabbi Kook reworks a famous line from Maimonides. In the first sentence of his great halachic work, the Mishneh Torah, Maimonides wrote: "The basic principle of all basic principles and the pillar of all sciences is to know that there is (yesh sham) a First Being [=God]." Speakers of Hebrew recognize right away that this is not standard Hebrew. Although sham means "there" when referring to a place, Hebrew doesn't use the word to mean "there is." The reason that Maimonides used it was already pointed out by his translator, Rabbi Samuel ibn Tibbon, at the beginning of the 13th century. Maimonides' Hebrew was that of an Arabic speaker, and in Arabic, the word thuma (cognate of the Hebrew, sham) is used in the phrase "there is."

Maimonides and the Shaping of the Jewish Canon
James A. Diamond
Cambridge University Press, 2014

> It's hard to imagine two more different interpreters of traditional Judaism than Maimonides and Rabbi Kook

Whether Rabbi Kook knew of ibn Tibbon's insight is unclear, but he read a mystical message into this phrase. He "interpreted" Maimonides as suggesting that only "there," on some other plane of comprehension, and not here in our rational world, could true knowledge of God be found. Rabbi Kook wrote that we reach this level only by using "that aspect of knowledge that is impossible to know," thus straying very far from Maimonides' belief that the student who follows an established curriculum of sciences and philosophy will attain the desired knowledge.

Maimonides himself was often accused of imposing a foreign worldview on the Bible, by reading it through the lens of neo-Aristotelian philosophy. Perhaps there is some poetic justice in the fact that others read his work as saying things Maimonides never imagined and never would have supported. In any case, as Diamond astutely shows, the attention paid to Maimonides' works by Jewish thinkers for the last 800 years proves that his works have become an integral part of the Jewish canon, texts that cannot be ignored and must be engaged.

Canadians should be proud that a first-rate Jewish studies scholar right here in Canada is continuing the tradition of engaging with Maimonides, and is sure to be studied seriously around the world. ■

Cook with oranges for Tu b'Shvat

SYBIL KAPLAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Tu b'Shvat, the Jewish New Year for the trees, is on Feb. 4 this year, and the fruits that are now in season in Israel are apples, persimmons, some strawberries (although beautiful, they are expensive) and several varieties of oranges.

One usually thinks of dates, figs and carob for Tu b'Shvat, the fruits of Eretz Yisrael but, for variety, here are some recipes using oranges and other fruits.

Syrian Orange Chicken

- ❑ 1 tbsp. margarine
- ❑ 1 tbsp. oil
- ❑ 1 cut-up chicken
- ❑ 1/2 cup orange juice
- ❑ 1 cup chicken broth
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. corn starch
- ❑ 1/2 chopped onion
- ❑ juice of 1/2 lemon
- ❑ 6-9 halved, pitted dates
- ❑ orange slices

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a baking dish. Heat margarine and oil in a frying pan and brown chicken. Remove chicken and place in a baking dish.

Add orange juice, chicken broth, corn starch, onion and lemon juice to frying pan and cook, stirring, until sauce thickens. Pour over chicken.

Cover and bake in preheated oven 45 minutes. Garnish with dates and orange slices, cover, and bake at least 15 minutes or until chicken is done. Good served with rice. Makes 4 servings.

Orange Drop Cookies

- ❑ 1 cup sugar
- ❑ 2/3 cup unsalted pareve margarine
- ❑ 2 eggs
- ❑ 1/2 cup orange juice
- ❑ 1 tbsp. grated orange peel
- ❑ 2 1/4 cups flour
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. baking soda
- ❑ 1/2 cup chopped nuts

Preheat oven to 350. Grease cookie sheets.

Cream sugar and margarine with eggs. Stir in orange juice and orange peel. Add flour, baking soda and nuts and mix well. Drop by teaspoon onto cookie sheets. Bake in preheated oven 10 minutes or until golden brown. Makes about 3 dozen.

Nectarine Spice Cake

- ❑ 6 seeded, peeled, cut-up nectarines
- ❑ 1/3 cup canola oil
- ❑ 3 eggs
- ❑ 1 cup brown sugar
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. ginger
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. cinnamon
- ❑ 1 tsp. vanilla
- ❑ 1 3/4 cups flour
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
- ❑ 1/2 cup non-dairy creamer

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a cake pan or two loaf pans, or place mini-papers in a mini-muffin pan and spray with vegetable spray.

Place nectarine pieces, oil, eggs and brown sugar in a mixer or food processor and blend a few seconds. Add ginger, cinnamon, vanilla, flour, baking powder and non-dairy creamer and blend.

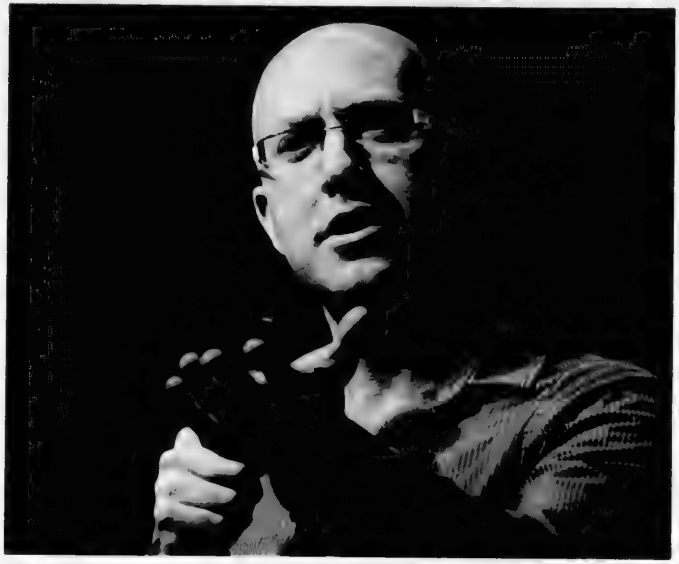
Spoon into baking pans. Bake in preheated oven 25 minutes or until a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out clean.

This recipe can be doubled.

Orange Juice Salad Dressing

- ❑ 3/4 cup oil
- ❑ 6 tbsp. orange juice
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. sugar
- ❑ pinch dry mustard

Combine oil, orange juice, sugar and mustard in a jar. Shake well. Goes well on salad with lettuce, avocado and grapefruit.



Shaarei Tefillah's Jan. 24 comedy night fundraiser features comedian Benji Lovitt.

Shaarei Tefillah holds comedy night to 'raise the roof'

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Jews face a lot of tough situations, so sometimes, it's good to get together and laugh, says Rabbi Shmuli Soroka, executive director of Shaarei Tefillah congregation.

With this in mind, the Toronto synagogue decided to make its upcoming fundraiser a comedy night. The event, "Raise the Roof Comedy Night," to be held Saturday, Jan. 24, at the shul on Bathurst Street, will provide "much needed" funds to help repair the sanctuary's roof, Rabbi Soroka said. It will feature American-born comic Benji Lovitt, who lives in Israel.

Though the evening's primary objective is fundraising, Rabbi Soroka noted, "We were thinking about how to go about this, and we decided that getting everyone out laughing, celebrating Judaism and even laughing at Judaism, would be a great idea."

Lovitt, who made aliyah in 2006, has performed for audiences throughout North America and Israel, including at Hillel and Jewish federation events and for Masa Israel Journey and Birthright Israel trips.

Known for his witty perspectives on aliyah and contemporary Israeli life, Lovitt has been referred to as the principal English-speaking standup comedian and writer in Israel.

He has written for and been profiled in a range of Israeli and North American media, including USA Today, Time magazine, Jerusalem Post and the Times of Israel, for which he blogs regularly.

Rabbi Soroka said he hopes the event will draw both members and non-members of Shaarei Tefillah, and he anticipates that individuals from across the age spectrum will be represented in the audience.

"We're a well-established shul in the community, and, at the same time, we're experiencing tremendous growth. We're seeing a lot of young families joining," he said.

To date, about 150 people are expected to attend.

Tickets, which are $100 each or two for $180, can be purchased online at www.shaareitefillah.com, by calling the synagogue office or at the door on the night of the event. Donation receipts for $50 and $80, respectively, are available to purchasers. ■

Doors open at 8 p.m. and the show begins at 8:30. Shaarei Tefillah is located at 3600 Bathurst St.

MARRIED WITH KIDS

I tried to be the Christmas Grinch

Lauren Kramer

Though it coincided with Chanukah this year, I couldn't help but feel grumpy about the Christmas cheer that pervaded my neighbourhood, especially when it arrived home in my Grade 6 daughter's backpack in early December.

The invasion came disguised as a notice from her teacher, declaring the class would be studying The Grinch who Stole Christmas and doing secret Santa gift exchanges. The book, her teacher said, contained a "universal message" from which everyone could benefit, while the gift exchange would be a "fun activity."

I wondered why, in a non-denominational school, the kids had to obtain their "universal message" in a Christmas-themed book that seems more appropriate for six-year-olds than kids age 11. But the secret Santa activity was the clincher, a place where I could finally take a firm stand without publicly embarrassing my kid. "We're Jewish," I said. "No… secret… Santa."

I wish I could say that this was the final word. Sadly, no. First, the pleading began. It's a harmless activity, she argued. A simple, inexpensive gift. And why should she be the only one not participating?

"Because we're Jewish," I answered. The pleading continued, and when she saw her mother was undeterred by appeals to price points or emotional anguish, she did what any other kid might. She turned to her Dad. When you can't get your way, it only makes sense to pit your parents against each other on the off-chance they disagree. We did.

"I think we should let her participate," my husband declared. "Our kid has a strong Jewish identity and this one activity won't change that. If her class is doing it, she should do it too."

I objected vehemently, arguing there was a great reason not to participate: the fact that we don't share the same beliefs as the families of other children in the class. Secret Santa was a nod to Christmas and an assumption that we all wanted to participate in its celebration – which definitely wasn't the case in our family. This seemed a good place to take a stand, I said. "Christmas is not our holiday, and missing out on the gift exchange is no big deal."

Christmas unsettles me. I dislike the incessant jingles on the radio and in every store, the focus on materialism and finding the "perfect gift" and the Christmas light competition in our street, where neighbours try to outdo each other in the volume and luminosity of their light display. But what really drives me bananas is when our "non-denominational" school becomes extremely denominational, studying Christmas-themed books, decorating offices and classrooms with festive Christmas décor and sending children home with secret Santa notices. I was grateful to escape the school's "holiday carnival" this year, since last year's, with its 20 Christmas carols and one token latke-dreidel song, only fuelled the fire of my discontent.

Since we couldn't reach an agreement, my husband suggested we call a friend, and that we both accept in advance his resolution to the issue. I knew the friend as a man with a big Jewish heart, so I accepted, thinking he would side with me.

"Truthfully I hate Christmas," he said. "But I think secret Santa is a harmless activity and one not worth fighting over. Just let her do it."

My daughter left for her last day of school before the holidays excitedly clutching the secret Santa gift she'd wrapped in Christmas paper she unearthed from a deep, dark drawer. While I understood her need to participate in the class gift exchange, I wasn't happy.

Still, we made a choice to put her in public school, and with that choice come denominational issues over which I have no control. So I send her out into the big wide world with a hope and a prayer that the Jewish home to which she returns every day will give her a strong religious foothold, one that secret Santa and Christmas Grinch books will never challenge. ■

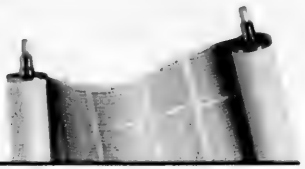
Parshah

Bo | Exodus 10:1 - 13:16



Maharat Abby Brown Scheier says if we're looking for direction from God, the signs are there
Rabbi Denise Handlarski explains why Rosh Chodesh has become a holiday for women
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen offers a reminder that redemption follows our darkest hour

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

We always look for signs that point us in the right direction. Our parshah this week begins and ends with signs. We start with God's signs to Pharaoh and Egypt, which are meant to have an everlasting effect on our impression of God. We end with the mitzvah of tfillin, which serve as a physical sign to remember that God took us out of Egypt.

The Israelites are given their first set of commandments in this parshah. These mitzvot set the tone for a community that is about to experience freedom. In many places, Chapter 12 of Exodus stresses that the mitzvah command is, in fact, given "lachem" – "for you." The signs are clear: mitzvot are not for God's sake, but for our own.

Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch (19th-century Germany) explains that "this month shall mark for you" a renewal that serves as a sign for our personal renewal. (Exodus 12:1) The calendar and our way of marking time provide us with constant opportunities for self-reflection and self-improvement.

Exodus 12:13 states that the blood placed by the Israelites on the doorpost "shall be a sign for you," even though its purpose seems to be to give God directions as to which house to pass over. The midrash explains that God does not need signs. The blood was actually put on the inside of the house, as a sign to us to remind us that we should be busy doing Jewish things within our homes.

The Torah states (Exodus12:14) that the day of the Exodus "shall be for you as a memorial." It is for our sake that we mark this day and celebrate our freedom, giving us a better understanding of our history and values.

If we are looking for direction, then the signs are right there to strengthen and better our communities, our homes and ourselves. ■

This parshah contains the first biblical mention of Rosh Chodesh, when God tells Moses that there should be a monthly celebration of the moon.

As Judaism evolved, Rosh Chodesh became a women's holiday. Women in many cultures are associated with the moon. Sometimes, unflatteringly, this is because the sun gets associated with logic and the moon with a "lunatic" element that's often applied to women.

Sometimes it is simply about the menstrual cycle. The time of the "red tent" (women had to be separated from the rest of the group during menstruation) would have followed the lunar cycle. As Anita Diamant makes clear in her well-known novel of that name, "the red tent" can be seen as a time for women's rest, togetherness and spiritual renewal.

The mention of Rosh Chodesh in Parshat Bo, just as the people are about to leave Egypt, also signifies renewal. Just as the moon waxes and wanes, Jewish history is made up of the textures of exile and return, bondage and freedom. Rosh Chodesh continues to be a time to think of renewal. It's like a mini-Yom Kippur that happens each month, giving us the chance to focus on our goals, on who we want to become and what we want to accomplish in the month ahead.

The Exodus story is a story of renewal and rebirth – fertility metaphors are therefore apt (let's not forget that Shmot begins with a birth, courageous midwives and a mother who puts her child's life before her own. Moses is not the only one "delivering" the people).

The parshah ends with the terrifying tenth plague – the death of the firstborns. The death of children is the ultimate signifier for destruction and death. But what follows is the ultimate signifier for birth and life. The Israelites are free and are therefore born anew. It is time for the rebirth and the renewal of the people. ■

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

How does a Jew take strength from the horrific news that four of our fellow Jews, shopping for Shabbat at a kosher supermarket, were brutally murdered?

The answer is found in the name of our parshah – "Bo," which means "Come."

Moses was commanded to approach Pharaoh and not be afraid. To reassure him, God said, "Come," (with me), not "Go" (alone). We all must confront "Pharaoh" and our challenges. God is with us, supporting our efforts. Let us "come" and remember those murdered Jews, and proudly say: "Je suis Juif." "Je mange cacher" – "I eat kosher."

Let us show the world that after such tragedy, we come in unity and openly show our Jewishness. We are a nation of peace and morality, a light upon the nations.

It was refreshing to see that an employee of the kosher store, a Muslim, saved Jews from being killed by hiding them in a freezer. So let's also teach our fellow non-Jews, the seven Noahide Laws, including the law "to respect the sanctity of human life."

At the close of this week's Torah portion, the Torah relates how the Jews' oppression in Egypt got worse. Even Moses, devoted to God, could find no explanation for the darkness of the exile.

The Talmud states that the Jews base their calendar on the rotation of the moon, for we are likened to the moon. Its light wanes and finally seems to disappear. But it is precisely then that the new moon is born and grows.

Jewish history reflects the lunar cycle. In the exile, after reaching the lowest depths of oppression, when the long night reached its darkest, then deliverance began.

In life, too, it may seem that our situation is beyond hope. Yet we should not lose faith, but remember that the darkest hour of exile comes just before the redemption. May we see it in our days! ■

British couple run N.S. fruit farm

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT

British couple Evie Kemp and Simon Fineman grow haskap berries on their farm in Nova Scotia.

Seven years ago, Simon Fineman and his wife, Evie Kemp, had little idea where Nova Scotia was.

The residents of Oxfordshire in central England were planning a trip to Norway that was waylaid by bad weather. They decided to visit friends in Nova Scotia, "loved the music, the walking, the outdoor experience," Kemp says, and, after seeing that house prices were dramatically lower than in England, bought a home on the South Shore, purchased a farm a few kilometres away in Lunenburg County, not far from Camp Kadimah, and started a business, although they are still based in England.

Today, their company, LaHave Natural Farms, produces a series of "Haskapa" brand products made from the haskap berry, dark blue in colour, naturally delicious, unique with a sensuous taste and remarkable health properties. Among the products are juices, jams, chutneys, tangy salsas, honey, maple syrup, ice creams and sorbets.

Fineman, 54, who is president of a British timber and hardware distribution business, Timbmet, based near Oxford, built a serious business from haskap berries after trying to make a go of other farm products like tomatoes and garlic.

"I Googled 'superberry' and found University of Saskatchewan was promoting the haskap, a little-known fruit outside Russia and Japan. It has antioxidant properties and high levels of vitamin C."

Kemp, 53, is a medical doctor who practises occupational medicine at the major hospital in Oxford. "We just wanted to make use of the land," she says. "What we grew was almost incidental at the time. It was only after we'd grown our first [berry] and actually tasted one that we realized how great they were. And we realized what we could do with them."

In 2013, their Haskapa juice was named best new entrant at the World Juice Awards in Cologne, Germany. Several mainstream grocery stores, including Sobeys, are now selling the products. With 10 staff and a seasonal crew in summer, and working 60 acres of arable land, Fineman aims to triple production acreage next year. He says they produced 15 tons of haskaps this year and hope to make that 1,500 tons in five years.

With knowledgeable leadership on the farm, Fineman comes to Nova Scotia every four to five weeks to oversee the operation. Kemp visits three or four times a year. With products selling in Atlantic Canada and Toronto, they hope to spread distribution to New York, California and Europe.

The couple, both British-Israeli citizens who lived on a kibbutz and moshav from 1988 to 1993, are also looking to get a hechsher for their juice.

Kemp even uses the berry to cook Jewish staples in her kitchen at home. "I have a Haskapa matzah pudding recipe, haskap honey cake for Rosh Hashanah, and it's a great topping for cheesecake for Shavuot. It's a mixture, but I think it's got its own taste. Haskaps look like an elongated blueberry. It's purple all the way through.

"It's fabulous to see the berries grow and seeing this land, which had nothing, come to life. Maybe it goes back to our kibbutz days. It's wonderful." ■

'I'm happy it's a landmark event'

"Judaism is important to us," he said. "It is an integral part of our lives."

As for the commitment ceremony, Scheinert doesn't feel upset that Rabbi Scheim won't perform the same service he would for a heterosexual couple.

In fact, he prefers it. The traditional service and the ketubah that accompanies it are quite legalistic and speak about one person belonging to the other.

"We're really not bothered, because the commitment ceremony is more reflective of our values," he said.

"It's important to us to have it in a synagogue," said Friedman. "We're both committed to Judaism, and it's important to us to have it in a place where the Jewish community would recognize the legitimacy of our marriage and the vows we're going to say to each other."

While he acknowledges that Rabbi Scheim's involvement signals "moving toward openness and acceptance," Friedman, said his friends, including those from the Orthodox community, "are taking our wedding as matter of fact."

For some, it might be considered a landmark event. "I'm happy it's a landmark event and definitely a conversation to have, so that all members of the Jewish community feel included," he said.

Younger people "don't bat an eyelash" when it comes to accepting gays. "It's not necessarily easy for my generation," said Rabbi Scheim, who has been a rabbi at Beth David for 34 years.

As a rabbi, he's attended weddings and funerals, and visited shivah houses. "When you see how precarious life can be, and as a rabbi you are exposed to pain, loss and tragedy, it gives me more of a sense of trying to meet the happy needs of people as well and bringing a desire for a Jewish connection when that connection is sometimes hard to find," he said.

"I have more of an incentive now for meeting a Jewish need in what is a happy circumstance.

"When two guys want the community to recognize their union in a synagogue with a kosher meal, I think that's great," he said.

"This is one of those cases where it's worth being groundbreaking." ■

Rabbi Daniel Freelander: WUPJ supports liberal Jews

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

This past September, Rabbi Daniel Freelander was appointed the new president of the World Union for Progressive Judaism (WUPJ), the international umbrella organization of the Reform, Liberal, Progressive and Reconstructionist movements in Judaism. WUPJ serves 1,200 congregations in more than 45 countries. Formerly vice-president of the Union for Reform Judaism in North America, Rabbi Freelander was in Toronto last month to meet with leaders of the local Jewish community, including UJA Federation, and to speak at both Temple Sinai and Holy Blossom Temple. The CJN spoke to him about the dynamics of Reform Judaism internationally, religious pluralism and the Canadian Reform movement.

What does your role as WUPJ president entail?

The focus is working with progressive and Reform congregations worldwide. There are 850 Reform congregations in North America and about 350 elsewhere in the world. In the U.S., about 42 per cent of affiliated Jews are affiliated with Reform congregations (compared to roughly 28 per cent Conservative and about 10 per cent Orthodox). In the rest of the world, the balance is quite different. In most countries, the established Jewish religious group is Orthodox, and Reform is often the second-largest. (The Conservative movement is stronger in South America, but not as much in Britain or Europe.) Our portfolio is to build progressive congregations and to make sure there's a progressive Jewish alternative [to Orthodoxy or the Conservative movement] in every major Jewish community.

Are there countries that you feel need a boost in progressive Judaism?

Absolutely. There are places that have nascent Reform communities that need help getting organized and finding rabbis, like Bangkok, Shanghai and Tokyo – places that don't necessarily have a financial need, but require organizational or spiritual help, such as guidance in locating a rabbi, prayer books, schools. This is in contrast to places like Belarus, Ukraine, Russia or parts of Poland, where [due to political circumstances] it hasn't been natural for Jews to gather in organized synagogues. There, there's really only Chabad and Reform, there's no modern Orthodox or Conservative options. So, we've been creating infrastructure of community workers to bring people together at early childhood centres or adult centres. Some of these are evolving into progressive congregations. Over the past 15 years or so, the WUPJ has put many millions into building community centres and synagogues, training rabbis and paying rabbinic salaries and training and hiring community workers in the former Soviet Union and parts of eastern Poland.

In those places, we've needed to raise funds for these things until those communities can afford to do so themselves.

In European countries, there's often an official Jewish community representative recognized by the government. For the Jewish community, it's often a chief rabbi, and the Reform congregations are often outside of that structure. In countries like Germany, they've been receptive to Reform. In other places, less so.

I can't emphasize enough how different every country is.

In what ways is Canada's Reform movement distinctive?

I'm not an expert on that, but going on perception, I'd say the Reform community in Canada is far more traditional in ritual practice and religious decisions than the Reform community in the United States. It's also probably less liberal. It's still a liberal group, but its predilections are distinctly Canadian, and in my mind, that means more traditional or conservative than American [religious decisions].

What would you say are the main factors that contribute to this phenomenon?

Reform Judaism in Canada, while it emerged in the early 20th century, didn't really grow in a big way until after World War II. The whole classical Reform period, [which took place in the United States] from the 1880s to the 1930s, never really took place in Canada. So Reform Judaism is older and more Germanic in the U.S. Canadian Reform Judaism has a much stronger eastern European influence. The U.S. didn't see much immigration after World War II, while Canada did, and the Holocaust and Israel played a much more central role in Canada than in the United States.

Is a commitment to social justice part of the WUPJ's mandate?

Yes. Our two big social justice pieces are: 1. Protecting religious pluralism – making sure Jews can practice in any way they want, regardless of where they live. So we spend a lot of energy practising non-Orthodox Jewish rights. We're really sensitive about the fact every Jew should have the opportunity to pray as he or she sees fit.

2. We see ourselves as the progenitors of the prophetic tradition of Jeremiah, meaning we look at the greater world and try to work within the framework of the larger society to move things forward. For example, our South African Reform congregations, which funded a series of early childhood centres in black townships to help raise literacy levels, or the food bank programs run by our Australian Reform congregations. We feel that we serve human beings, not just Jews. We want our members to see themselves as part of a larger world community, not separate. We have an obligation to make things as positive as they can be in the larger community. In apartheid days [in South Africa], a lot of the white leadership involved in the anti-apartheid movement came from the Reform leadership.

> We're really sensitive about the fact every Jew should have the opportunity to pray as he or she sees fit.

In which places are restrictions placed on Reform or progressive Jews?

In Romania, for example, the government only wanted to grant not-for-profit status to Orthodox congregations, to groups associated with the country's official "Jewish Church," if you will. So, Reform congregations there couldn't get non-profit status. We've had some successes there. We had to work with the government. It's been a long battle, and requires us to educate non-Jewish political leaders in the varieties of Judaism.

In Poland, the Orthodox Jewish establishment owns and operates all the Jewish cemeteries in the country. They wouldn't recognize Reform conversions to Judaism so wouldn't allow the burial of Reform converts in the Jewish cemeteries. That's not a government issue, but it's an issue we're fighting.

What sorts of issues does the WUPJ address in Israel?

In Israel, we have a strong affiliate: the Israeli movement for progressive Judaism. They have a full staff of their own and are a rapidly growing, with 60 congregations. We helped create and fund them. We still fund many of the rabbinic salaries in Israel. We've created a network of synagogues there that are pretty much self-sufficient, or are getting there.

What was the purpose of your recent Toronto visit?

I came to thank the Toronto-area congregations who have been very supportive of the WUPJ – especially Holy Blossom Temple and Temple Sinai, which have helped fund rabbinic salaries in Israel and elsewhere. I also went to meet with our prime supporters, who helped build significant congregations in Israel. The new chairperson of the WUPJ is Canadian, Carole Sterling. She's the first Canadian in 20 years to be the organization's international chairperson.

What, primarily, do you hope to accomplish during your tenure as WUPJ president?

Specifically, I'd like to accomplish the creation of new congregations in places where we know there are critical masses of non-Orthodox Jews, but where the latter haven't organized yet. I was, for example, thrilled to work with new congregations in Tokyo, Shanghai, and Bangkok, where liberal Jews have been for years but are finally wanting to get organized. There's also a new Reform congregation in Rome that has just emerged, and several in North America. Getting these new congregations on their feet is a very high priority.

The second area is the former Soviet Union. There, Jews commonly become associated with synagogues through their children, which is the reverse of what we have in North America. In the former Soviet Union, young people will go to Jewish summer camp on scholarships, which are really about indoctrination in Judaism. The kids will come home very excited, and the parents won't know what they're talking about. We offer family camps so that the whole family can experience the joy of intensive Jewish living, 24/7. These kids will become the leaders of the new congregations. In Belarus and Ukraine, congregational leadership tend to be in their 30s or 40s, so it's very different from the typically older lay leadership in North American and even Israel, where parents try to convince their kids to get involved [in synagogue life]. In Belarus and Ukraine, it's the reverse, and I find that very exciting. That's where we're investing a lot of resources, to youth access. ■

No one, not even a biblical figure, is too big to fail

Backstory

PAUL SOCKEN

Has there ever been a people whose heroes are so deeply flawed?

The first Jewish king, Saul, errs and is told by the prophet Samuel that his kingship is over. Instead of accepting the verdict – a divine edict since Samuel is God's conduit – Saul becomes determined to do anything to preserve his throne, including murder. He attempts to kill David, his presumptive successor, with a spear but fails. Saul instructs his servants and his son, Jonathan, to end David's life but Jonathan, the epitome of loyal and devoted friendship, warns David, who flees.

The first book of Samuel ends with the Philistine attack on Israel in which most of Saul's sons, including Jonathan, are killed. Saul throws himself on his sword and dies.

The story of Saul is an extraordinary study of the hold power has on an otherwise great man.

King David, the most renowned Jewish king, falls in love with his military commander's wife and has the commander sent to a vulnerable part of the front in the war so he will be killed and David will be able to consummate his love. David's successor, Solomon, known as the wisest of men, author of much of Judaism's wisdom literature, takes foreign wives who eventually corrupt the nation by importing their pagan gods.

Even the patriarchs and matriarchs, venerable, holy and righteous, were not perfect according to Jewish tradition. Abraham, the embodiment of lovingkindness, and chosen by God to be the first Jew, erred in leaving Canaan for Egypt during a famine and told the pagan king that Sarah was his sister, not his wife. Both actions can be justified on a practical level – he feared for his wife's safety and believed she would be less likely to be taken to the king's harem if he thought she was Abraham's sister – but Abraham is criticized by Jewish sages for not trusting God sufficiently. Sarah is the object of criticism for despairing of having a child and giving her handmaid, Hagar, to Abraham.

The criticism continues with Jacob who steals Esau's blessing, and with Moses' brother and sister, Aaron and Miriam.

When Moses is on Mount Sinai receiving the Torah, his brother, Aaron, is coerced into building the infamous Golden Calf to mollify the Israelites who are impatient to see their leader, Moses. Miriam denigrates Moses' choice of wife and is punished by God. Even Moses himself – in Jewish tradition, the greatest man who ever lived – displeases God by hitting the rock, instead of speaking to it, to make it miraculously yield water to quench the thirst of the people.

"No religious literature", writes Jonathan Sacks, former chief rabbi of Great Britain, "was ever further from hagiography, idealization and hero-worship."

One of the chief purposes of Jewish biblical writing is to convey the idea that all people, even the most illustrious religious figures in history, are imperfect but capable of spiritual growth. No one is too great to fail. The most worthy and esteemed must work every day at the details of daily life.

Conversely, no one is doomed to failure by fate or circumstances. The sons of Korach – who rebelled against Moses and was punished by God Himself – sang songs in the Temple of Solomon.

We see in the kings and the patriarchs and matriarchs, the flaws inherent in greatness, the contradictions at the heart of the human condition, the questions that remain with our best efforts at understanding. Imperfect and fallible, we are all on life's journey in which, as Sacks so eloquently puts it, "the greatest have failings and even the worst have saving graces."

So, if even role models are imperfect and the worst are capable of redemption, what is Jewish scripture teaching? Simply put, that no one is expected to be perfect but all are required to strive for moral and ethical growth.

As the English poet, Robert Browning, wrote: "Ah, but a man's reach should exceed his grasp/Or what's a Heaven for?" It is the attempt that is more important than the goal, the inner struggle more significant than any idealized destination. The quest itself is the purpose. ■

Tel Aviv man allegedly hacks Madge, and Selma's rabbinic omission

Madonna's newest Israeli connection

An Israeli man, 39, suspected of hacking into Madonna's computer last month and leaking songs for an upcoming album was arrested in Tel Aviv Jan. 22 after an undercover investigation by Israel's anti-fraud police. He's also accused of hacking into the computers of other global artists. The alleged hacker, whose name is protected by the court, reportedly sold the 27 unreleased tracks online. Madonna released six tracks early in response to the hack, which she called "a form of terrorism" and the equivalent of "artistic rape." The suspect is reportedly a former contestant on an Israeli reality show singing competition.

Heschel airbrushed out

The daughter of the late Conservative icon Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, who marched with Martin Luther King Jr. on the third civil rights march from Selma, Ala., in 1965, says she was "shocked and upset" her father was left out of Selma, the new biopic about the slain U.S. civil rights leader. "I felt sad and I had moments when I felt angry," Susannah Heschel, a Jewish studies professor at Dartmouth College, told the Algemeiner newspaper about the omission, calling it "tragic." She said the film excised "the great coalition" aspect of the civil rights movement and missed a chance to show black youths that a rabbi marched with King. Director Ava DuVernay told PBS in response: "This is art… I'm not a historian."

A hairy solution to anti-Semitism?

After hearing reports of anti-Semitism in Europe and tour guides there telling Jewish tourists to remove their kippot, Shalom Koresh, a hairdresser in Rehovot, Israel, devised the Magic Kippa, a skullcap made of hair that blends seamlessly with a wearer's own hair colour and texture to look invisible. Ones made of human hair sell for a pricey 79 euros ($110), while others with synthetic hair cost 49 euros ($68). He had the idea last year, well before recent terror attacks, and has had positive feedback, though not from one Ynet commenter, who said: "Better idea: ticket to Tel Aviv." ■

Remembering the Shoah

On Jan. 27, the international community, Canada included, commemorates the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Nazi concentration camps. Generally, we think of liberation as something glorious, something celebrated. But the response was not as jubilant as one may suspect. Many who were liberated immediately faced a plethora of challenges ranging from not over-eating (which usually resulted in death), finding safe shelter, and locating surviving relatives.

Holocaust survivor Elly Gotz often recounts his experience of liberation during his many well-received talks to schools around the globe. After being liberated from Dachau by Soviet troops, his weakened and malnourished father, Julius Gotz, responded to the news by asking when his soup ration would be available – a very genuine concern. Liberation symbolized very real and new concerns, and was not a time of carefree celebrations.

The eventual defeat of Nazi Germany was surely cause for joy in the Allied world, but the liberation of the camps was not celebrated with parades, banners, and sensuous kisses in the street. Shortly after the war, Holocaust survivors had to rebuild their lives, often in hostile environments with little support. Even in Canada, the reception of survivors was lacklustre. But as time passed and our collective memory grew, we began to acknowledge the true horror that the Holocaust represented, and that celebrating those who survived those horrors was necessary.

Currently, conditions for many around the world are far from favourable. International manifestations of anti-Semitism are apparent on our front pages daily, as well as other manifestations of hatred and prejudice.

Shortly after the war, the Polish American Journal wrote an article recognizing a "week of brotherhood," a Jewish and Christian initiative meant to inspire peace and religious tolerance. This was a time where regardless of faith, race, or ethnicity, people would join to focus on one another's humanity and not what divides us. The PAJ stated that fascism and all forms of hatred should not, and could not, be the ideology that ever prevails, not during the war, nor after. Instead, the week of brotherhood should inspire an attitude of neighbourliness not only for seven days, but all year long.

In 2015, we could use this example and apply it, not only on Jan. 27, but every day, so that "never again" represents a genuine reflection of what we stand for as a tolerant and civilized nation.

Terror in Paris

We continuously read about the attacks on the offices of Charlie Hebdo and the kosher market as if they were separate and unrelated incidents. The former was an "attack on the freedom of expression" and the latter an "anti-Semitic assault." In fact, both horrific acts were anti-Semitic. Two of those murdered in the Hebdo offices, Georges Wolinski and Elsa Cayat, were Jewish.

Cayat, in particular, is significant because she was the only female among all those women in the office who died. Survivors have said that the murderous terrorists specifically stated that they didn't kill women "except for this one," referring to Cayat. So, indeed, both attacks were founded as much in anti-Semitism as anti-cartoon.

The press, especially the French press, will downplay this relationship, but no one should be fooled. Six Jews died on those terrible days, not four, and the root cause was much more than just a cartoon about Muhammad.

No peace with Hamas

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict was never a territorial one, but an existential one. The question here is can a non-Muslim country, by definition an infidel, be allowed to exist in the Middle East? This is the core of the dilemma.

It is useless to talk of borders when the attitude is, "You don't belong here. You are a result of a catastrophe." History is being denied, including archeology: no Temple, no kings, no Judea. It is all a Zionist plot.

The pact with Hamas terrorists, sworn to destroy Israel, with a one-way sea trip for Jews, speaks volumes of their future intentions. But as long as Israel cannot be defeated, the strategy remains: Israel wins and it gives back land; Hamas wins, keeps all and Israel goes.

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Violence in the name of God

In the aftermath of the terror attacks in Paris, do we demand that local Muslim leaders condemn Islamist radicalism, or does that tar an entire community for the acts of a few?

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Grushcow: Let me begin with some of the words I sent to my congregation as news was coming in about the attack on the kosher supermarket in France: first, may we stand by our co-religionists in France, supporting them in every way we can. No one should have to be afraid to go to synagogue, shop for kosher food or walk in the streets wearing a kippah.

Second, may these events not become an excuse to attack Muslims. We must come to terms with the fact that there is a strain of religious extremism and violence in Islam, as there has been in Christianity and Judaism. This is indeed a religious ideology – but it is wrong. Let us hear the voices of condemnation from so many in the Muslim world, knowing that the goal of the attackers is to divide us. Let us work even harder to find ways to understand one another, and to live together, to create a civil society shaped by shared values and respect... As religion continues to emerge as an all-too-often force of violence, may we be vigilant in remembering that these attacks are profoundly opposite to what it means to live in service to God.

Rabbi Korobkin: You're right: this tragedy was compounded because it was done in the name of religion. We should mourn, therefore, not only for those innocent journalists, officers and Jews who were mercilessly slaughtered, but also for the disgrace to God and all religion.

However, I think your response is a bit too tepid for the sheer magnitude of this violent tragedy. No one needs to "come to terms" with the fact that Islam contains a faction that is extremist and murderous. Rather, as Prime Minister Stephen Harper put it, we need to accept that "the international jihadist movement has declared war... And the reality is we're going to have to confront it." No longer can we afford to give a free pass to the Islamic leadership in our communities. Every Canadian has the right and duty to call out local imams and have them show their cards.

Rabbi Grushcow: I know that a number of my congregants will agree with you on this. However, I do not.

My eyes are wide open: there is a jihadist movement growing, which poses a real and present danger. But the fact that there is a dangerous movement within Islam does not mean that every Muslim in the world should be held accountable for their doings. Did I need to apologize when Baruch Goldstein massacred innocent Arab worshippers in Hebron?

To tar all Muslims with the same brush would be to scapegoat an entire community for the acts of a few. That approach has ended badly for us when we have been on the receiving end. I refuse to use it myself.

Here in Montreal, where so many Jews have connections to France, we feel this attack especially deeply. So what can we do? Pay attention to security. Build allegiances between people of all faiths and none, to work toward a civil society that is both safe and open. Remember the value of every human life. That is the struggle that we face as we mourn our dead and step forward into tomorrow.

Rabbi Korobkin: I agree that it's important to forge relationships with Christian and Muslim leaders. We are actively attempting to do this, but it has become increasingly difficult to find Muslim religious leaders who are prepared to unequivocally condemn radical jihad. We have very few partners here in Toronto with whom we can dialogue. Until Islamic leaders take up the cause of eradicating Islamic violence as their first priority, instead of condemning Israel and all their other perceived enemies first, it will be hard to come together on anything.

I was a young rabbi 21 years ago when Baruch Goldstein committed his horrific crimes, and yes, I did feel it necessary to condemn his behaviour and make sure my congregation knew that there is nothing in the Torah that could possibly condone his violent act. I expect nothing less from all other people of faith. ■

He married Dora Pack and during the late 1880s, the couple moved to St. Catharines with their eldest three children. The family relocated to seek a better life and reside close to him. Between 1890 and 1897, they had three more children. Richard began working as a pedlar and later became a metal junk dealer.

Sunshine and temperatures of 24C late last week brought many people out to the beaches in Tel Aviv.

Bibi and Bougie go to Washington

In December, a poll ranked the leading issues for Israeli voters ahead of March 17 national elections. The economy placed first at 34 per cent, followed by security (30 per cent) and social justice (14 per cent). On the other end of the list, only one per cent said foreign relations would figure in their voting decision, but you'd hardly have guessed that after a week in which Israel's ties with two of its key allies, Canada and the United States, took centre stage.

John Baird and Lisa Raitt, Canada's foreign affairs and transport ministers respectively, began the week in Israel, where they signed a handful of new agreements with the Jewish State, including plans to co-operate against "efforts to single out or isolate Israel." Ottawa also took a stand last week against the increase in hatred and violence toward Jews when Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney told a meeting of the United Nations General Assembly "Canada is deeply concerned about the alarming increase in anti-Semitism worldwide."

There was more. The federal government announced plans to fund 10 Israeli companies to the tune of about $150,000 each, with an aim to develop health, water and agricultural innovation in developing countries. (The seeds of that partnership were apparently sown a year ago, when Prime Minster Stephen Harper made his first state visit to Israel.) And later in the week, Baird again confirmed the government's support of Israel: "Israel is the only democracy in the region," he told CJN reporter Paul Lungen. "They are our strong friend and ally."

The mood in Washington was decidedly tenser, after Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu became publicly involved in a clash between President Barack Obama and the Republican Party.

Netanyahu accepted an invitation from Republican House Speaker John Boehner to address a joint meeting of the U.S. Congress, where he is expected to speak in favour of new sanctions against Iran, an initiative opposed by the president. The White House complained Netanyahu breached protocol by accepting Boehner's invitation without first consulting the Obama administration and announced the president would not meet with the prime minister while the latter is in town.

Experts subsequently proclaimed "a new low" in Israel-U.S. relations, and a senior U.S. official said "Netanyahu ought to remember that President Obama has a year and a half left to his presidency, and that there will be a price" for snubbing the White House.

Netanyahu's speech to Congress has since been moved from Feb. 11 to March 3, when he will be in Washington for the annual conference of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC). Yitzhak ("Bougie") Herzog, head of Israel's Labour Party and co-leader of the centre-left bloc now known as the Zionist Camp, will also speak at the AIPAC summit.

That means two weeks before the Israeli election, the two front-runners to lead the next Knesset will be halfway across the world, looking to drum up support among people who don't have a vote. Perhaps after Paris, the calculus has changed. But ultimately, Israelis will be left to decide the value of politicians pursuing foreign friendships at a time when there are other pressing concerns at home. ■ — YONI

Toronto's Mount Sinai had humble beginnings as a dispensary

Bill Gladstone

When Dr. Daniel Drucker of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital receives the $150,000 (US) Manpei-Suzuki prize for groundbreaking diabetes research in February, he will be only the latest in a long parade of medical researchers at the world-famous institution to be recognized for their excellence.

A researcher engaged in a different sort of quest – probing the origins of the Mount Sinai Hospital – is struck by Mount Sinai's humble beginnings more than a century ago.

Mount Sinai's roots go back to about 1910 when nurse Dorothy Goldstick (later Dworkin), Ida Siegel and some volunteers and medics opened a free Jewish medical dispensary on Elizabeth Street just south of Agnes (Dundas) in Toronto's old Ward neighbourhood.

Toronto then had a burgeoning population of about 18,000 Jews, up from only 3,000 a decade earlier. Most were poor Yiddish-speaking recent immigrants in need of assistance.

As Dworkin reveals in a biographical essay, she became a maternity nurse in 1907 and worked with Dr. S. J. Kaufman, a doctor from Cleveland who set up a private dispensary for Jewish patients in the Ward. The clinic proved popular because Yiddish was spoken there and visits cost only 50 cents instead of the usual $1 charged at other facilities. Drugs were supplied by the Hashmall pharmacy.

Dworkin and others opened the free Jewish medical dispensary after Kaufman returned to the United States in 1909. Apart from medical reasons, a Jewish-run clinic was an absolute necessity in the eyes of its founders because the Presbyterian Church was also providing free medical services to local Jews from a clinic on Teraulay (Bay) Street while trying to convert them to Christianity.

Again in reaction to the missionaries, Dworkin, Siegel and others formed a Women's Auxiliary that distributed pasteurized milk at the very low rate of two cents a pint. It also founded a Jewish orphanage that was later headquartered on Annette Avenue.

Although the Jewish medical dispensary "petered out" after Dworkin left in 1911 to get married, the impetus for a Jewish hospital in Toronto remained strong. A small historical pamphlet published by the women's charitable organization Ezra Noshem (Helping Women) tells the next chapter of the story.

Founded in 1913, Ezra Noshem was galvanized into action by the heartbreaking account of a 96-year-old patient at the Don Avenue Incurable Home. Its president, Slova Greenberg, "could not bear to see the woman cry and pray that she might die among Jews," and vowed to establish a home for Jewish elderly. Founded in 1917 on Cecil Street, the Jewish Old Folks Home evolved over the decades into what is now the Baycrest Centre.

Empowered by its own success, Ezra Noshem next pushed to raise funds for a Jewish hospital, and in December 1921 purchased an existing but primitive facility on Yorkville Avenue, opening it in 1922 as a 20-bed hospital. The years brought enormous upgrades and improvements: the hospital façade that is still visible on Yorkville today was not part of the original structure, but rather the result of a 1935 expansion.

Decades of planning and fundraising went into the new Mount Sinai Hospital on University Avenue and involved the concerted efforts of many players, including Dworkin, various hospital volunteer women's groups, a board of directors chaired by E. F. Singer, and a group of Jewish doctors initially called the Toronto Jewish Medical Association.

Preserved at the Ontario Jewish Archives, the Association's minute books from the mid-1920s show that the doctors thought the hospital board much too sluggish and sought diplomatic means of persuading its members to start planning for the much bigger, modernized Jewish hospital that was already so desperately needed.

The new Mount Sinai opened on University Avenue on Aug. 18, 1953, and has become a world-renowned centre of excellence. Not the least of the wonderful things to occur there is the birth of this reporter, along with his sister, in September 1953 as the first twins born in the new hospital. How true, indeed, is the observation that mighty oaks do from tiny acorns grow. ■

WHEN IT COMES TO TRAVEL INSURANCE, WHY TAKE CHANCES?

Just ask yourself these seven simple questions

- Does your broker offer an annual plan that covers you even if you have a change in medication/condition during the year?
- Do they help you obtain the best plan to fit your budget and medical needs?
- Do they help you understand the coverage and loop holes in credit card, group benefits and OHIP programs?
- Do they have access to a variety of travel plans that provide coverage for medical conditions that only meet a 7 day stability requirement?
- Do they have a plan that will protect you from a voided policy for non-disclosure in the event of an error made on your application?
- Do they help you at time of claim and assist with the paperwork delivering personalized 24/7 friendly service?
- Do they cover you for high risk activities or offer plans that cover ANY medical condition including organ transplants and bypass over 12 years ago?

If you can't put check marks next to all of these questions, it's time you called the travel specialists at Travel Secure.

CJN DEBATE: Free speech after Paris

Offensive opinions benefit from being aired, not muzzled

MARNI SOUPCOFF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It is a truism that distasteful, unpleasant or highly controversial speech is usually the only kind of speech that really needs defending. But in the wake of the deadly Paris terrorist attacks against Charlie Hebdo cartoonists and Jews, and the efforts to test speech limits that followed, it is a truism worth repeating.

It's not the nice, respectful commentary that riles up the censors. It's the offensive stuff, the stuff that makes you cringe, wince or shake your head in disgust, the stuff that surely everyone with a bit of sense would reject. The question is whether we're better off letting those with a bit of sense voluntarily dismiss the nasty commentary on their own or if we should have government step in and formally silence the nasty commentators.

The former strikes me as a far better course of action than the latter, and I'm joined in this view by no less eminent a thinker than John Stuart Mill.

Among Mill's reasons for valuing freedom of expression so highly was that even in cases where the received wisdom of the majority happens to be wholly true, that opinion still benefits from being earnestly debated and contested from time to time. If it's not, it will devolve into nothing more than dogma that people are told they must believe without remembering or knowing why.

The recent example of the Halifax hotdog vendor who sought to test the limits of free expression by tweeting Holocaust jokes is a good example of Mill's point.

In a nutshell, Jerry Reddick, a Muslim who sells hotdogs near the Dalhousie campus, and who is better known as "the Dawgfather," was testing us. His inflammatory tweets about Jews were accompanied by the hashtag #freespeechworksbothways, and he was seeking to make the point that if speech mocking sacred Muslim subjects – speech like the Charlie Hebdo cartoons which mocked the prophet Muhammad – is legal, then so, too, should be speech mocking subjects sacred to other religions.

Incitement to hatred is different than blasphemy

DAVID MATAS
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Are we consistent when we say that Charlie Hebdo should be free to satirize Islam but that Dieudonné should be prohibited from promoting anti-Semitism? My answer is yes.

The two positions are different, because they deal with different forms of speech. There are some free speech absolutists who say anything goes – whether it is fraud or plagiarism or threats of murder or defamation or child pornography. For those who accept that some restrictions on speech are justifiable, the issue becomes which ones.

Charlie Hebdo arguably was blasphemous. Dieudonné is engaged in incitement to hatred. It is perfectly consistent to hold that the right to free speech should prevail over the right to be free from blasphemy and that the right to be free from incitement to hatred should prevail over the right to free speech.

A prohibition against blasphemy is meant to protect the believer from insult and to protect us from a breach of the peace that the outrage from the insult may provoke in the believer. A prohibition against incitement to hatred is meant to protect us from those incited.

A prohibition against blasphemy is as wide as all outdoors, because religion is any spiritual belief. A prohibition against incitement to hatred is more limited, because what is prohibited is the incitement to hatred against identifiable groups – groups that are currently or have traditionally been disadvantaged.

One reason we protect freedom of expression is to arrive at the truth. The prohibition of blasphemy impedes the search for truth. To take one example, Galileo was prosecuted in the 17th century for blasphemy for his views that the earth revolved around the sun. If we had effective global blasphemy laws had been in effect from the 17th century until today, we might still today be prevented from saying that the earth revolves around the sun.

Incitement to hatred serves no similar truth-seeking purpose. It is an absurd position to say that maybe it is true that racial slurs are true, that Jews control the world, that blacks are less intelligent than whites and so on. The mere suggestion that these utterances might be true gives credence to them, something we would not want to do.

Anxiety in our time

Avrum Rosensweig

We don't know what we have until it is eaten away at. How could we?

Is it possible for a child who grew up in a peaceful, rational society to understand and recognize how other nations operate? Could I, as a child of the '60s and '70s, feel the oppression of such states as Libya or Congo, where its citizens are persecuted and made to feel fear by selfish dictators and self-centred autocrats? I have never double-locked my doors or looked over my shoulder in fear of uniformed men.

Yet recently I had a talk with a friend who told me she is frightened in a way she has never felt. She told me, "I am scared ISIS is coming over here," in reference to the very chilling Islamic State terrorizing Syria and Iraq. She added that for the first time in her life, she is developing anxiety and panic, believing that things are changing in our peaceful forest, Canada, and violence is coming our way.

My friend attributed her fears to what she reads in the news – journalists having their heads lopped off and children being forced to kill grown men. She is shaking at such barbarism. She cannot sleep as she used to and doesn't feel the Canadian sense of freedom she once did.

I am not certain how to calm her because I am beginning to feel the same. For the first time in my life, I too fear those in our midst, in our neighbourhoods, down the street from us, who only this past summer during the war on Gaza, walked proudly and openly with placards at anti-Israel protests calling for "Jewish children into the ovens." The fundamentalist Muslims and their allies here in Toronto are truly upsetting.

I can only answer her that most people are noble, that goodness ultimately triumphs. I also encourage her to become part of the change – to fight the bad guys, and even more, to work toward strengthening the virtuous. While I am uncertain of the future and how to battle the present, I cannot approach it in any other way.

> The fundamentalist Muslims and their allies here in Toronto are truly upsetting

I must be involved in this revolution and I express an invitation to you to do the same.

Embrace the Christians, the Muslims, the other, those whom you know, and create energy of peace and tolerance. As a community, let's be introspective and determine how prepared we are for the rough days by coming together and asking some key questions such as: are we doing enough to ensure the safety and security of our members; are we all playing an activist role in the strengthening of the Jewish People; do the major Jewish organizations including the Jewish federations and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) have a plan if Canada takes a European turn for the worst?

It is crucial that we, the Canadian Jewish community, recognize that we have had some very good decades, perhaps the best throughout history. It is paramount that we understand we have to strategize together to create a plan for our own future. And it is crucial for our leadership to look closely at what is occurring around us and act as role models for the rest of our members, taking the perilous events happening in every continent, very seriously.

My friend is scared. She feels that we could be in the midst of a world war, one that will require a massive response from millions. How do we contain fundamentalist Islam? How do we fight terrorists on our streets? How do we wake up our own Jewish neighbours so that each and every one of us plays a role in fighting evil forces and finding peace in our world, which is beautiful and where most people are decent?

Peace cannot be kept by force; it can only be achieved by understanding. – Albert Einstein. ■

Jews and aboriginals a powerful team

Bernie Farber

Jews get it. We understand bigotry and discrimination. More sadly, we understand how otherwise civilized people and nations can target the most vulnerable amongst us. We also know what it means to be a stranger in a place you call home while simultaneously having a visceral appreciation of what it means to be an aboriginal person. As Irwin Cotler is fond of saying "Jews were the aboriginal people of Israel."

Our history is one fraught with all of these elements; exile, inquisitions, pogroms and ultimately even genocide. It's for all of these reasons that we of all people should also embrace the plight of Canada's First Nations people.

Yet since immigrating to this country over the last 100-odd years our connection to Canada's aboriginal people has been limited at best.

Don't get me wrong; from time to time there have been intersections. In the late 1980s during the ascendancy of neo-Nazi groups in Canada like the Heritage Front, we found ourselves thrown together to deal with a common enemy. The late Rodney Bobiwash was an anti-racist worker with Toronto's Native Canadian Centre during that time. Together with Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) we confronted bigots like the now deceased Wolfgang Droege, exiled Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel and others as they threatened and targeted both our communities.

And philanthropists Larry Tanenbaum as well as Dr. Michael Dan (with whom I work) have been very generous in their outreach to First Nations in Canada. However, for the most part especially in the past, our paths rarely crossed.

Two significant events changed the dynamics at the turn of the 21st century. Former Assembly of First Nations (AFN) chief and community elder David Ahenakew's unprovoked verbal attack against Jews told us that we needed to work towards a better understanding. This led to the first ever First Nations /Jewish community mission to Israel as a means by which to share our stories and histories.

Led by CJC and the AFN, it saw 18 First Nations chiefs and elders participate in a first ever visit to the State of Israel. We learned together of our common tragedies while visiting Yad Vashem where we shared stories of the Shoah and residential schools. We felt each other's pain in the wiping out of generations, the loss of culture and the failed attempts to destroy our traditions.

We have a long way to go. Happily, today's generation of young Jews have found ways to reach out to Canada's First Nations. Recently I participated in a Justice Shabbat that brought together a number of synagogues and temples with First Nations advocates to engage in a discussion of our commonalities.

Young Jewish activists and consultants work with First Nations using both their acumen and cultural history to connect. Folks like Steven Strauss and Jon Telch, young Jewish government consultants with a wealth of contacts between the two of them work closely with First Nations reserves and organizations.

Steve has been working in the aboriginal space for five years. He began working at a Toronto-based boutique government relations firm, where he predominately represented First Nations communities and organizations in Ontario. Only 18 short months ago, Steve decided he would start his own firm, Steven A. Strauss & Associates Inc.

Jon Telch joined Steve in June 2014. Jon has worked for a federal member of parliament, tasked mainly with policy research and speech writing. After a stint in politics Jon moved to London, England where he earned a master of science in politics and international relations. Jon has always been active as a community advocate, and currently sits on the board of the Jewish Refugee Action Network and as the political consultant to a campaign to end child poverty.

Steve and Jon are able to marry their skills, education and passion for community advocacy into assisting First Nations. With their added Jewish soul, their work with Aboriginal Canadians is a partnership fuelled by an added knowledge of the importance of history and spirituality. ■

A new kind of Judaism is emerging in Israel

Rabbi Dow Marmur

Some Israeli businessmen are said to have funded a campaign to get their fellow Jewish citizens to the traditional Shabbat table. Their message is commendable, but their ads that ridicule Jews who don't observe Shabbat in a traditional way have alienated many of those whom they were supposed to attract. Ostensibly non-observant Israelis are scandalized. They insist that their way of life isn't less authentically Jewish than that of those who denigrate it in the name of Judaism.

They have a point. The conventional manifestations of religious Judaism – Orthodox, Reform and Conservative – are all Diaspora creations and often very different from what the ancient sources teach. Though each movement claims authenticity, none appears to have it more than any other.

One of the challenges of the leaders of all conventional manifestations of contemporary Judaism is to accept that Judaism is likely to undergo radical changes now when Jews have a state of their own.

Each movement claims to address the challenges of Jewish statehood, but the evidence doesn't always support it. Extreme (haredi) Orthodoxy is determined to recreate the world that was lost: Ashkenazi haredim want to live in an east European shtetl, albeit with modern facilities. Their Sephardi counterparts have brought with them the Judaism they and their forbears practised in the countries of the Middle East and North Africa. Both are out of place in Israel.

Modern Israeli Orthodoxy claims to be more indigenous, but its embrace of the settlements in the West Bank and of reactionary politics is alienating many citizens.

Conservative and Reform congregations may try hard to turn themselves into Israeli creations, but their theologies have been shaped by America and Europe.

Hence the efforts to formulate a different and truly Israeli Judaism that, though secular on the surface, may be no less Jewish in terms of commitment to the history and the sources of Judaism, and to the love of the land.

Many Israelis may not observe Shabbat the way the ads suggest, yet they may live up to what Shabbat stands for in other less ritualistic but no less authentic ways. Understandably, they resent a campaign that denigrates their efforts.

Tel Aviv is considered to be the most secular city in Israel, yet it's there that many of the new initiatives start. Two examples:

First, in its decade-long existence, Beit Tefilah Yisraeli has fused contemporary Israeli culture with Jewish tradition. Its Friday night services in the port of Tel Aviv bring together hundreds of worshippers who wouldn't be seen in synagogues. Its study sessions attract many who don't wish to associate with any of the traditional movements.

Second, about 25 years ago, Dr. Ruth Calderon founded a secular pluralistic Beit Midrash, and subsequently Alma, an institution devoted to helping Israelis to connect to Jewish tradition.

These efforts have given impetus to similar groups in other ostensibly secular places in Israel. And beyond that, much of popular culture is suffused with traditional Judaism, reflected, for example, in the many contemporary Israeli songs set to psalms and to traditional prayers.

To denigrate and ridicule these efforts is to ignore early signs of a renaissance of Jewish thought and practice that may render the old distinctions between secular and religious obsolete.

Prof. Arnold Eisen, the chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary, the nerve centre of Conservative Judaism in North America, in acknowledging that a new kind of Judaism is emerging in Israel, has written that he wants "neither to romanticize nor dismiss it." In fact, he seems to want to claim it for his brand of Judaism.

So does Rabbi Meir Azari, who runs a very successful Reform congregation and community centre in Tel Aviv. He believes that it's there that the future of progressive Judaism is to be found.

Instead of judging the new manifestations of Judaism through the lens of forms forged abroad, we've every reason to refrain from criticizing it only because it doesn't conform to our ways. ■

Jennie Rosenfeld's appointment is wonderful news

Anat Sharbat

A stained-glass ceiling has been cracked.

Women no longer learn Torah solely in order to be talmidot chachamot (learned scholars), but are actualizing their halachic and spiritual skills as they take on official communal roles. An exciting development in this trend is Jennie Rosenfeld's recent official appointment as the spiritual leader of the city of Efrat in Israel.

This is big news in Israel. For the first time in the country, women are publicly acknowledged as religious and spiritual authorities, acting as clergy alongside their male rabbinic counterparts.

The process for modern Orthodox women to take leadership roles has been gradual. Step by step, the early toanot rabaniyot (halachic advocates) broke down the doors of the Israeli rabbinate as they supported women in the often convoluted and arcane divorce courts (batei din). Yoatzot halachah (halachic advisers) were the next generation, and they were granted the authority to use their knowledge of the laws of niddah (menstrual purity laws) to advise on halachic questions brought to them by women. Another step was the ability of women to take on roles as supervisors of mashgichot kashrut (kashrut supervisors). Now comes the next stage: women are using their knowledge to take on public roles in communal, religious, spiritual and halachic leadership.

In the past few years, several women in the United States and Canada were ordained by Yeshivat Maharat (N.Y.), and now serve as full and equal leaders of Orthodox congregations. Rabba Sara Hurwitz, the dean of Yeshivat Maharat, has been leading at the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale. More recently ordained are Maharat Ruth Balinsky-Freidman at Ohev Shalom in Washington D.C., Maharat Rori Picker-Neiss at Bais Abraham in St. Louis, Maharat Rachel Kohl-Feingold at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal and Maharat Victoria Sutton-Brelow at Congregation Beit Israel in Berkeley, Calif.

These developments mark a clear need that exists within modern Orthodox communities in Israel, as well as in the Diaspora – the need for women to lead in communities, not just for the sake of women, but for the strength of the entire congregation.

The Diaspora and Israel face different challenges, however. In North America, a single synagogue will look to rabbinic leadership for pastoral care and spiritual guidance. The model in Israel is slightly different; rabbis anchor particular geographic locales, not just one place of worship. Synagogues led by a single rabbi or a clergy team, serving only a segment of the local community, are much less common. The appointment of Rosenfeld as spiritual leader of the city of Efrat is an important choice, because she adapts to the model of rabbinic leadership in Israel serving everyone in the community.

Since religion and state are not separate in Israel, it is important to note that Rosenfeld will not be paid by the Israeli government. Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, the founding chief rabbi of Efrat, has chosen to sustain and support the role, and I hope that it will become the seed for other communities to invest in female leadership.

In order for the glass ceiling to truly shatter, women in Israel must be recognized by the state through the payment of salaries to women in positions of spiritual and halachic leadership. This is the next step.

Rosenfeld's appointment is a sign that the movements in North America and Israel are nourished by one another and are constantly in dialogue.

As it says in Ecclesiastes, "Two are better than one, because they have a good reward for their toil."

I believe that Rosenfeld's appointment makes strides not only for women, but for the strength and health of our community as a whole. ■

Anat Sharbat has a doctorate in Talmud from Bar-Ilan University and will receive smichah this year from Yeshivat Maharat.

'I think we have to break down the shame'

Jewish leaders are being encouraged to raise awareness and help women access resources in the community

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

The Jewish community is no less affected by domestic abuse than the general population, but there is still a misconception that Jewish families are somehow immune to it.

The general consensus among professionals who provide resources and services for Jewish victims of domestic abuse cite the fact that many members of the community don't feel comfortable discussing it publicly because of the shandeh, or shame, of not having shalom bayit, a peaceful, happy home.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of the non-profit organization called Act To End Violence Against Women (ATEVAW), said that raising awareness about the issue and the resources offered by her agency and others throughout Canada is just as important as the services they provide.

"I think we have to talk about it and break down the shame and recognize that things happen in relationships," Krowitz said.

One of the ways that would help bring the issue of domestic abuse in the Jewish community to the forefront is to have community leaders, including rabbis, speak freely about the issue, she added.

"One of the things... we've done in the past, and I'd like to do it again, is to convene a meeting of rabbis, a training of rabbis, so that they have more of a sensitivity to this issue," Krowitz said.

Janice Shaw, Jewish Family & Child's York Region direct service manager, said her agency runs a synagogue outreach program to encourage rabbis to speak to their congregants about the issue.

JF&CS has placed posters in women's washrooms at Jewish institutions around Toronto.

"The goal of this outreach was to meet with rabbis and/or synagogue groups to ensure information and resources were shared on the issue of domestic violence with the goal of increasing safety for women and children in synagogue communities," Shaw said, adding that JF&CS recently secured funding to launch the second phase of the project next month.

Rabbi Ed Elkin, spiritual leader of Toronto's First Narayever Congregation, recalls having a JF&CS representative come to his synagogue in 2013 as part of the program.

"She came to speak one Shabbat to try to highlight the issue in our community and make the synagogue a place where people who were suffering from domestic abuse, primarily women, could feel that it is a place that the issue could be talked about and could find ways to address their situation through the synagogue," Rabbi Elkin recalled, adding that she brought posters that were put up in the women's washrooms to provide contact numbers and encourage women who were being abused not to suffer in silence.

Rabbi Elkin said he has not yet addressed the issue of domestic abuse in one of his sermons, but he said he's certainly not opposed to the idea, and he believes he and other rabbis have a role to play in lifting the stigma surrounding domestic abuse in the Jewish community.

> One of the things we've done in the past, and I'd like to do it again, is to convene a meeting of rabbis, a training of rabbis, so that they have more of a sensitivity to this issue.

Diane Sasson is executive director of Auberge Shalom Pour Femmes, Montreal's kosher women's shelter. She noted that the organization's centre for external services – which serves women who aren't living in the facility – employs an Orthodox counsellor.

"This Orthodox counsellor is the one who gives the centre credibility that... we will respect all forms of Judaism. We do have a number of Orthodox clients as a result of many years of working with rabbis and leaders and women to make them feel safe halachically in our environment," Sasson said.

She said that over the years, Auberge Shalom has forged relationships with rabbis and encouraged them to give sermons at their shuls.

"We're still trying to make inroads in the Sephardi community in Montreal, which is very traditional... They have the belief that the rabbi needs to be central, so in those communities, I think it is step by step, rabbi by rabbi, conversation by conversation," Sasson said.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL BRIDGEPOINT ACTIVE HEALTHCARE are proud to announce a voluntary amalgamation to create the

Sinai Health System

A message from our leaders

Mount Sinai and Bridgepoint are coming together to create a premier exemplar of an integrated health system that provides better, more coordinated care, particularly for those patients with the greatest healthcare needs.

Together with home care provider Circle of Care, we will leverage our collective strengths to serve our patients in ways we could not achieve alone — from healthy beginnings to healthy aging, in the hospital and in the community.

We look forward to this exciting and important journey together.

Canada, Israel agree to boost co-operation

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Canadians are used to the government's strong support for Israel. So it was no surprise that during Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird's recent visit there, he re-tweeted: "Canada doesn't stand behind Israel; we stand shoulder-to-shoulder with it."

Baird's trip came one year after Prime Minister Stephen Harper's first visit to Israel, when he signed a strategic partnership memorandum of understanding. Last week, Baird and his colleague, Transport Minister Lisa Raitt, signed a series of agreements for enhanced co-operation between Canada and Israel on a number of fronts:

• a joint declaration of solidarity and friendship that reaffirms the two countries' commitment to a strategic partnership and names areas of increased collaboration in diplomacy, trade and development;

• a memorandum of understanding to expand diplomatic consultation;

• a memorandum of understanding to "work together to oppose efforts to single out or isolate Israel by developing a co-ordinated public diplomacy initiative to oppose boycotts of Israel, to oppose those who call into question the Jewish state's right to exist and to work to counter the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement";

• the two countries agreed to promote bilateral trade and explore joint business opportunities in third countries.

In addition, Raitt and her Israeli counterpart, Yisrael Katz, signed three agreements on air transport and aviation security.

Meanwhile, at an informal meeting organized by the United Nations General Assembly, Steven Blaney, Canada's minister of public safety and emergency preparedness, told the 50 member states attending that "Canada is deeply concerned about the alarming increase in anti-Semitism worldwide. We have seen recent violent events against Jews at home and abroad, whether at a kosher grocery in Paris or at a synagogue in Edmonton, that convey a clear message of hatred towards Jewish people."

"Canada knows that history has shown that the enemies of freedom and democratic rights often target the Jews first. As I said to Jews I met this year in Israel, Paris and in Canada: Canada is your friend and Canada is your ally. We stand with you."

Speaking from Davos, Switzerland, where he was attending the World Economic Forum, Baird told The CJN, "We have a great relationship with Israel. It's grown stronger every year that Stephen Harper has been prime minister. We have some honest differences of opinion with the Palestinian Authority – obviously their unilateral actions at the UN and the International Criminal Court (ICC). We take strong issue with the decisions they have made, but we have decent relations with the Palestinian Authority."

Asked about a recent column in the Globe and Mail by chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat, which urged Baird to apologize for Canadian policy, Baird said he hadn't read it. But, "I do know he made comments comparing the government of Israel with ISIL, which is deeply offensive."

Baird acknowledged that the ICC came up in meetings with the Palestinians. "I just outlined how problematic their unilateral action by going to the ICC is. Obviously this further handicaps the government of Israel from protecting the government and the people of Israel. We're concerned about the politicization of the ICC against Israel."

Regarding attacks on civilians, Baird said, "Terrorism is the great struggle of our generation. Far too often, the State of Israel and the Jewish People are on the front lines of that struggle. The attack on the kosher supermarket in Paris was obviously an anti-Semitic attack. People who were inspired by ISIL and radical extremists obviously pose a real threat to Israel, to Jews and to Canadians as well."

About critiques that the Harper government has departed from a more even-handed approach to the Middle East, Baird said, "Canada is not the referee for the world. My job is to promote Canadian values. Israel is the only democracy in the region. They are our strong friend and ally.

Lisa Raitt

"But we have excellent relationships with the Arab world," he continued. "I had a very good meeting [Jan. 22] with [Egyptian President Abdel Fattah] al-Sisi. We have good relationships with Jordan, with the government of Egypt, with the leadership in Saudi Arabia. We have great relationships with the Emirates, with Bahrain. So our relationship in the Arab world is very warm.

"We have an honest difference of opinion on one issue, but when it come to the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, we share the same view. When it comes to [President Bashar] Assad's war against his own people in Syria, we share the same view. When it comes to ISIL, to Iran's nuclear program and its support for terrorism, we share a lot in common." ■

Anti-Semitism in Edmonton: hatred not confined to Europe

Rabbi Daniel Friedman

On Shabbat morning, Jan. 17, we arrived for services at Beth Israel Synagogue in Edmonton to find our building desecrated with hateful anti-Semitic graffiti. The mood in shul that day was one of shock and fear as we were awakened to the reality that baseless hatred of Jews isn't confined to the Middle East or Europe. Here, in multicultural Canada, in our thriving city of Edmonton, anti-Semitism had reared its ugly head.

It wasn't the first attack on an Edmonton place of worship in recent weeks. Previously, a Sikh temple was the target of hate. It seems the perpetrators were trying to take revenge for the Islamist terror in France and mistook the temple for a mosque. All were swift to condemn the horrible act: how dare these bigots make our Canadian brothers and sisters – Muslim or Sikh – feel unwanted in our wonderful country!

What followed, however, was the sad story of the Jewish People throughout our history. Whenever an attack is perpetrated on innocents by hateful extremists, targeting Jews is never far behind. Hitler began his reign of terror by attacking neighbouring lands, but this was merely a precursor to the annihilation of our people. Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait, then began lobbing missiles at Israel. In Paris, Islamist terrorists went on a rampage at Charlie Hebdo, followed promptly by the Hyper Cacher massacre.

While the violation of the synagogue doesn't in any way compare to those tragedies, when the Sikh temple was attacked, we should have realized we would be next. We must always stand at the forefront of combating prejudice and bigotry directed at any minority, in Canada and worldwide – primarily because it's the right thing to do, but also because we know that extremists might begin with one minority, but history has shown we're never immune. My greatest regret is that I didn't immediately issue a public statement condemning the attack on the Sikh temple.

The good news is that the outpouring of sympathy and support has been heartwarming. I've received countless emails and phone calls from random citizens expressing solidarity, from as far afield as a pastor in Cold Lake, Alta. Federal Minister of State Tim Uppal issued a public condemnation and personally called me to offer support. A local imam reached out to me. A Muslim university student volunteered to assist with the cleanup. Words can't express how overwhelmed we feel by the love and care we've received from our fellow Canadians.

The most important thing to remember is that the evil perpetrators are individuals. Most Canadians – of all stripes – are peace-loving, tolerant people. Indeed, outside Israel, Canada is the best country in the world for Jews today, and perhaps all of history. Last January, I accompanied Prime Minister Stephen Harper to Israel. At the end of the trip, in a private moment, I told him, "Mr. Prime Minister, not since Cyrus the Great have the Jewish People had a world leader like you. You are the new Cyrus." He humbly said I was too kind. But he, along with Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney, Foreign Minster John Baird and Uppal, are leading the fight against anti-Semitism and intolerance worldwide.

And they're not just paying lip service to the cause. They take positions internationally based not on what's easiest and most comfortable, but on what is the moral, right thing to do. They understand and recognize the reality of anti-Semitism and bigotry, and are fighting the forces of evil. One of their major contributions to Canada is the National Holocaust Monument, now being built in the capital, in which they've invested millions of dollars, because they want to show Canada and the world that we're committed to ending prejudice and bigotry.

On behalf of Edmonton's Jewish community, I want to wish much strength to our Sikh neighbours and offer my blessing to Edmonton police that they find the perpetrators of these terrible acts and bring them to justice so that we can all sleep sounder knowing that we're living in the safest and most secure country on the planet. ■

Rabbi Daniel Friedman is spiritual leader of Beth Israel Synagogue in Edmonton and chair of the National Holocaust Monument Development Council.

Woman born in Auschwitz to attend liberation anniversary

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Anglea Orosz and her mother Vera

It's fair to say that Angela Orosz doesn't remember much of anything about her time in Auschwitz. After all, she was barely more than one month old when it was liberated on Jan. 27, 1945. Nevertheless, she admits to feeling "terrified" about returning to the Nazi death camp.

Orosz, who turned 70 in December, will join hundreds of other Holocaust survivors, heads of state, political and religious leaders and many more to mark the 70th anniversary of the liberation of the camp by Soviet army forces.

"I didn't want to go," Orosz said on the phone from Montreal. "My daughter pushed me. She wants to show what we became. They tried to wipe us out, and now we're flourishing."

Orosz, who has two children and seven grandchildren, with one more on the way, will be accompanied by her daughter, Katy, for her first trip back to the place of her birth. As far as she knows, she is one of only two people born in the camp to have survived. The other was born on liberation day in 1945 and now lives in Hungary, but he is not planning to make the trip.

Making the visit more palatable for her will be her post commemoration trip. Orosz will fly from Poland directly to Israel, copying the itinerary of March of the Living (MOL) participants.

As it happens, documentary filmmaker Naomi Wise will be in Poland to record the return of five Canadian Holocaust survivors to Auschwitz, including Orosz. She will tell their story, beginning in Canada as they prepare for the momentous event, and will follow them to their hometowns in Poland before accompanying them to the commemoration ceremony in the camp.

Wise said the short documentary films from the trip will be available for public viewing on the MOLarchiveproject.com website, along with previously recorded testimonies of other Shoah survivors. Citizenship and Immigration Canada provided a grant of $100,000 to make the films, along with the already completed documentary Auschwitz-Birkenau: 70 Years After Liberation, A Warning to Future Generations.

Orosz's parents, Tibor Bein and Vera Otvos, were Hungarian Jews who married in 1943. When the Germans invaded Hungary in March 1944, they were sent to a ghetto and were soon deported to Auschwitz. Her mother was two months pregnant at the time. With the naivete of someone unfamiliar with the camp, she identified herself as pregnant to Dr. Josef Mengele, who supervised the selections of those who would live and those who would be killed.

For some reason, Vera was spared from joining others being sent to the gas chambers and death. She was first put to work doing hard labour, working on roads. Later she was transferred to the kitchen, and finally she was sent to "Kanada," the depot where prisoners' property was sorted.

"Mengele didn't forget about her. He took her to experiment with the pregnancy," Orosz recounted.

Her mother was kept with twins and given injections for some unknown purpose. Remarkably, she survived and gave birth to Angela on Dec. 21. Two hours later, she had to join others in a roll call.

During the day, her mother left her alone on the top bunk in the barracks. Orosz was too weak and frail to cry. Despite having only water to drink, her mother was able to produce enough milk to keep her alive, Orosz said. Somehow they survived until liberation, but on Jan. 27, Orosz weighed barely more than a kilogram.

After liberation they travelled to a number of Polish cities and ended up in Slutsk, in what is today Belarus. They returned to Budapest in October 1945.

At one year of age, Orosz weighed three kilograms, about the size of a newborn. Nobody thought she'd survive except her mother and one doctor. She was always considered a miracle child, Orosz said.

Orosz and her family left Hungary because of pervasive anti-Semitism. Today she feels obliged to speak out and "to face anti-Semitism head on."

In travelling to Auschwitz, Orosz will be part of a group of about 300 camp survivors. This is likely the last such large-scale commemoration of its kind, given their ages, said Eli Rubenstein, national director of March of the Living Canada.

MOL Canada's Digital Archives Project will not only document the 70th anniversary event, but it is collecting previous recorded survivor testimonies, which will be stored on an interactive website as sn educational resource, said Wise.

Auschwitz-Birkenau: 70 Years After Liberation, A Warning to Future Generations, Wise's film, will be shown in Parliament Jan. 27 as part of an event hosted by Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney. ■

Jewish, Polish communities partner in remembrance

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

Winnipeg's Jewish community is marking the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz with three interrelated programs.

The centrepiece is a three-week exhibit (running till Feb. 13) titled The Face of the Ghetto: Pictures taken by Jewish Photographers in the Litzmannstadt (Lodz) Ghetto 1940-1944. The exhibit opened with the North American premiere of the Polish documentary film Wielka Szpera (The Great Szpera) on Jan. 25, at the Berney Theatre and will end with a community lecture by Thomas Lutz, the exhibit's curator and senior consultant with the Topography of Terror museum in Berlin, on Feb. 11.

The program was put together by the Freeman Family Foundation Holocaust Education Centre of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada and its chair, Belle Jarniewski. Two years ago, Jarniewski and the Holocaust education centre partnered with a major Winnipeg church – Westminster United – to mount an exhibition, Names Instead of Numbers, stories of former inmates – both Jewish and non-Jewish – of Dachau. For this current exhibit, Jarniewski arranged to partner with the Polish community. The exhibit will be shown at the Ogniwo Polish Museum Society in North Winnipeg and the Consulate General of the Republic of Poland in Toronto is one of the sponsors (along with the province of Manitoba, the Ridd Institute for Religion and Global Policy, University of Winnipeg and the University of Manitoba faculty of arts).

The connection with the Ogniwo Polish Museum, she said, was Dan Stone, a past president of the Jewish Heritage Centre and retired U of W history professor whose specialty was Polish history. He did a presentation at the museum last year.

"Dan and I discussed the idea of the exhibit with the museum representatives," Jarniewski said. "They were very excited about hosting it."

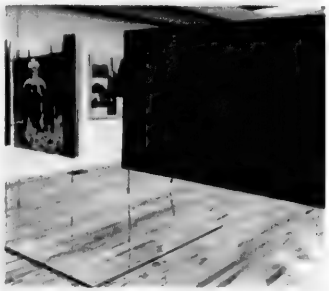
The Face of the Ghetto - pictures taken in the Litzmannstadt (Lodz) Ghetto 1940-1944 is a travelling exhibit, which was developed by Lutz and Ingo Loose for the Topography of Terror Documentation Centre – the exhibit's home base – in June 2010. The nearly five-year-old centre is an outdoor and indoor museum built on the site of the former SS and Gestapo headquarters in Berlin.

The exhibit features the work of a handful of Jewish photographers, commissioned by the Litzmannstadt (Lodz) "Jewish Council," to take photographs of almost every aspect of ghetto life. Nearly 12,000 contact prints have survived and are currently held in the Lodz state archive. Fifty large-scale photographs from the Litzmannstadt Ghetto – the name given to Lodz by the German occupiers in 1940 – are in the exhibition, making the little-known photo collection accessible to the public for the first time.

Jarniewski said the exhibit has been shown extensively in Europe, and within the last year been featured at Osgoode Hall in Toronto and, most recently, Dallas, Texas. The travelling exhibit includes statements from former ghetto residents and entries from the ghetto chronicle. A short overview of the ghetto's history, a description of the photography as a historic source, and information about the photographers provide an introduction into the exhibition.

The film, Wielka Szpera (The Great Szpera), she noted, is a documentary about the week in September 1942, when the Nazis forced the Judenrat (Jewish administration) in the Lodz Ghetto to select 15,000 children, elderly and physically or mentally disabled ghetto residents for deportation to the death camps.

Szpera is German for curfew. "It was horrific having Jewish police help to round up their own people," Jarniewski said .



An exhibit of Lodz Ghetto photography runs until Feb. 13.

Jarniewski met Thomas Lutz in December at the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance conference in Manchester. (She was part of the Canadian delegation.)

"I found out that he gave lectures at Osgoode Hall and York University last year," she said. "I asked if he would be willing to come to Winnipeg. We got the Ridd Institute at the University of Winnipeg to sponsor him. He will be speaking at both universities here in addition to his public lectures."

All events are free. ■

Moishe House opens second Canadian outpost in Toronto

KORTNEY SHAPIRO
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Moishe House, an international organization that seeks to provide meaningful Jewish experiences for young adults, opened in Toronto's Annex neighbourhood earlier this month.

The residents of all 74 international houses are primarily post-college young adults who, in exchange for subsidized living accommodations, are given a budget to organize and host seven or more programs and volunteer opportunities a month in their respective communities.

The non-denominational organization began in 2006 with four friends in Oakland, Calif., hosting their peers for Shabbat dinner. The Toronto house is the second one to open in Canada, after one in Vancouver that opened in 2011.

Thornhill native Amanda Snow, who works as a fund development co-ordinator at the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada, is one of five residents, all in their mid-20s, of Moishe House Toronto.

The other four residents, who will live in the house near Dupont Street and Spadina Road for one to three years, are Brett Karp, Aaron Savatti, Abigail Engelsman and Jillian Windman. The residents pay rent, which is heavily subsidized by local philanthropists.

David Cygielman

"How often do you see an event but you don't want to go by yourself? Moishe House gives you a family to do that with," Snow said.

"We're bringing people in, in a social way, and introducing them to what is available in this community through every community organization. We're trying to engage with everyone in the community who want to engage with us. We want the community to tell us what they want."

Moishe Houses can be found in cities such as Buenos Aires, Tel Aviv, Shanghai and, Sydney, Australia. Residents typically live in them for one to three years. They're currently in 17 countries and engage more than 5,200 young Jews in programs year-round.

The opening of Moishe House Toronto – which attracted more than 150 people to its inaugural housewarming event on Jan. 17 – is part of a growth strategy that aims to double the number of locations by 2017.

"About a year ago at a board meeting, a board member [asked about] the cities that have the most number of young adults [and] where we can make the largest impact of engaging young Jewish adults on a local level, and Toronto was on the top of that list," said David Cygielman, founder and CEO of Moishe House.

"I hope down the road that there are multiple Moishe Houses in Toronto," he said at the opening event. "One of the unique things about Moishe House is that it allows young adults to be the creators and leaders of the community, which is really nice… They really step up and do an amazing job when given a real opportunity to do it."

Moishe House residents and participants can also take part in learning and leadership retreats, and residents can go to an annual resident leadership conference each summer.

"The idea is to be able to connect to one another and your Jewish community and Jewish experience in today's world," Cygielman said. "It's even more important to be able to feel like you have that connection and network internationally."

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Community Connect (COCO), federation's young adult engagement arm, is collaborating with Moishe House in the hope of creating inspiring Jewish experiences for young professionals, said Jessica Taylor, manager of leadership initiatives with COCO.

"We feel a special connection to the Moishe House, as residents Jillian Windman, Aaron Savatti, Brett Karp and Amanda Snow are all active members of our Taglit-Birthright Israel CIE Madrichim training program, and we've already started to get to know Abi Engelsman through COCO's Live the Cause volunteer initiative," Taylor said.

"This team certainly has the skills and passion to make a great impact on our community through their work with the Moishe House." ■

Neighbourhood shul celebrates sanctuary renovation

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Beth Lida Forest Hill Synagogue, which recently celebrated its 100th anniversary, has renovated its sanctuary and social hall.

On Feb. 3 at 7:30 p.m., the community is invited to join the members of the congregation at a reception to celebrate the completion of their renovation and to honour their major donors.

Appropriately, Beth Lida, as it is affectionately known, chose Tu b'Shvat, the New Year of the Trees, to celebrate the restoration of the shul.

Beth Lida, also known as "the neighbourhood shul," is located at 22 Gilgorm Rd, in the Eglinton Avenue-Chaplin Crescent area.

"The beautiful new sanctuary, which accommodates 124 people, will help to ensure our continuation as a warm, welcoming home to everyone in the community for generations to come," says Eshai Hirshberg, Beth Lida's president.

In 1912, immigrants fleeing from tyranny and religious persecution from an area that is now part of Belarus, founded Beth Lida on Terauley Street (now Bay Street).

As the congregation grew, 12 years later, the Orthodox shul moved to the Kensington Market area to a cottage on Augusta Avenue. In 1950, as the Jewish community in Toronto moved further north, Beth Lida moved to its present location in a former church on a quiet one-way residential street.

Seen in Beth Lida's newly renovated sanctuary are, from left, Eshai Hirshberg, president, Joe Goldman, a major donor, Joseph Bigio, interior designer and Amy Anidjar, Goldman's daughter.

Beth Lida, with 60 member families, has regular Shabbat and festival services. The shul does not have a full-time rabbi. Guest rabbis and congregants lead the services and the members deliver sermons and present shiurim with emphasis on congregational participation and singing.

"Since our founding in 1912, Beth Lida's strength has always been the generosity, loyalty and commitment of our members, who have contributed their support to the shul in a myriad of ways," says Hirshberg.

"A great deal of love and devotion has gone into this project and we're delighted with the results."

Hirshberg adds, "As Toronto's beloved neighbourhood shul, we look forward to welcoming the entire community to daven with us, enjoy the best hot Kiddush in town, and take part in great programs for singles and families – all in our new surroundings."

Interior designer and minyan regular Joseph Bigio told The CJN that the two-month renovation extended the bimah, updated the lighting, improved the entrance to the sanctuary, and updated the finishes.

"There were multiple challenges inherited with very old buildings," says Bigio. He adds that he decided to work with the building and fit the old with the new.

"We worked around existing features such as the Aron Kodesh wall with its Roman travertine stone cladding, the curved ceiling, and the existing wood flooring," Bigio says.

"The result is a much brighter, vibrant and elegant environment, to the great satisfaction of the members of the congregation."

Martin and Nurit Bloomberg spearheaded the donor renovation campaign.

The Schlussel family will dedicate a shulchan cover in memory of the late Sidney Schlussel, the shul's beloved shamash for many years. ■

B.C. event aimed to renew Jewish Renewal movement

ALON WEINBERG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A diverse group of some 75 Jews gathered at Vancouver's Or Shalom synagogue over the Shabbat of Jan. 16 and 17 to pray and eat together, and to advance the "Jewish Renewal" movement in Canada.

The event was hosted by Aleph Canada, the umbrella group co-ordinating what longtime director Rabbi Daniel Siegel calls "the movement for the spiritual renewal of Judaism."

Aleph Canada is part of the larger Aleph: Alliance for Jewish Renewal movement started by the late Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi and his students. Rabbi Schachter-Shalomi died in 2014 just shy of his 90th birthday. He was known for his attempt to bridge old-world Judaism with "Aquarian consciousness," weaving ecology and feminism into a holistic, contemporary Jewish practice.

At the Vancouver retreat, after each meal, people gathered for rounds of sharing ideas. The Shabbat lunch session was based on Rabbi Siegel having asked congregants during morning prayers to note the parts of the service they connected to and where they felt their values were expressed in the liturgy. There were at least as many perspectives shared as there were people in attendance, consistent with the Renewal methodology of breaking down the divide between rabbi and congregant, teacher and student.

The various points of view were revisited after Shabbat, when local facilitator Michael Mann documented all that had been discussed over the course of three Shabbat meals.

Recommendations that emerged for the Aleph Canada board included holding online and telephone courses, organizing annual gatherings that alternate between eastern and western Canada, working on an "aging-to-saging eldering project," facilitating inter-generational conversations, and holding events to reach young people in less traditional venues.

The Vancouver gathering was the third in Aleph Canada's series of consultations held across the country. The first, held during the Shabbat of Sukkot, was hosted by Montreal's B'nai Or community at the Montreal JCC for Jews of Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto. The second, a week later, was held at Regina's Beth Jacob synagogue, another Aleph affiliate.

Attending the Vancouver event was Montrealer and B'nai Or's spiritual leader Rabbi Sherril Gilbert, who is also Aleph Canada's associate director and playing a larger role as Rabbi Siegel seeks to take a back seat in the day-to-day management of Aleph Canada.

Rabbi Siegel is hoping to devote more time to realizing a key project of Rabbi Schachter-Shalomi: the Integral Halakhic Institute, a project of the larger, U.S.-based Aleph to be run by Rabbi Siegel from his B.C. home that aims to produce progressive halachic responsa from beyond the bounds of Orthodoxy.

Asked about challenges she faces as interim associate director of Aleph Canada, Rabbi Gilbert said she hoped to have more in-person contact with Renewal-oriented Jews and Jewish communities across Canada. She said her job is to help spread the joy, practices and ruach of Jewish Renewal in Canada.

"There is an increasing recognition [that] Renewal has made inroads into all the denominations and is starting to be accepted as a legitimate resource in progressive Judaism," Rabbi Gilbert said. ■

Teens to bake 500 hamantashen for vulnerable Jews

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Tamara Weiss, a Grade 10 student in Toronto, speaks eloquently about giving back to the Jewish community, an experience that she says is characterized by "unity and selflessness, which are essential to a prosperous community."

Weiss is one of 20 teenagers taking part in the Toronto Diller Teen Fellows Program, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 15-month leadership development initiative for Jewish youths in grades 10 and 11.

On Feb. 1, the fellows, along with university students from various Toronto campuses who are involved with Hillel of Greater Toronto, will meet at the Prosserman JCC to bake 500 hamantashen for 500 mishloach manot packages.

The latter will be delivered to Toronto Jews living below the poverty line before Purim, on March 4. The event will kick off a community-wide tikkun olam initiative in the weeks leading up to the holiday to support and raise awareness for the most vulnerable people in the Jewish community.

The Diller fellows aim to achieve this in collaboration with 11 Jewish poverty relief agencies, which will mobilize volunteers to assemble and deliver the mishloach manot packages to those in need.

The fellows will also spend the afternoon of Feb. 1 brainstorming ideas for a social media campaign they'll be co-ordinating to raise awareness in the Jewish community about Jews living in poverty.

"To be involved in a community-wide tikkun olam project focused on poverty awareness is inspiring and humbling at the same time," Weiss said, adding that "partnering with Hillel... will allow us [fellows] to learn more about leadership opportunities on campus."

The collaborative tikkun olam venture, which includes groups such as Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS), Ve'ahavta and Circle of Care: Home Care for Seniors, taps into the idea of matanot le'evyonim – giving gifts to the poor – which Raquel Binder, co-ordinator of the Toronto Diller program said, "Purim is based on."

Binder said the project was developed in response to the fact some 24,000 Toronto Jews – 13 per cent of the GTA's Jewish population – live below the poverty line.

"[Our fellows] spend a lot of time learning about tikkun olam, and this project is an incredible opportunity for our young leaders to stand up, take action and connect with the [marginalized people in the] community that they've learned so much about," Binder said.

Toronto's 20 Diller Teen Fellows are Jewish students from across the city in grades 10 and 11.

Now in its third year in Toronto, the Diller Program is sponsored by the Helen Diller Family Foundation, a foundation of the San Francisco Jewish Community Federation's Jewish Community Endowment Fund. The fellowship operates in 11 North America communities and in South Africa, each partnered with a different Israeli city.

The goal, said Binder, is "to develop future community leaders with a strong Jewish identity and commitment to the Jewish People, respect for pluralism and a love of Israel."

The Toronto fellows, whose sister region is Eilat-Eilot, will get more information from a JF&CS staffer who will attend the baking event to talk to the teens about Jews in poverty. "The message is simple," Binder said. "Jewish poverty is not just a problem, it is our problem. We have a responsibility to take care of one another."

The 500 package recipients include single parents, Holocaust survivors and isolated seniors. Binder said they'll also feature items such as dried fruit, citrus fruit and canned tuna. Each will additionally contain a list of available Jewish agencies in the city that help the most vulnerable members of the community. ■

The summer camp for the talented students

Curious what scientists really do? Want to see for yourself?

Come work with real scientists in state-of-the-art labs at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology.

Who should be interested

If you are a science-oriented high-school student, in the 11th or 12th grade, with a proven record of academic excellence, then the SciTech International Summer Program may be for you.

The program is intended for all those with a keen interest in science and a commitment to high performance standards. Those who can benefit the most from the Technion's atmosphere of excellence will be selected.

The tuition fee of US$5,400 includes the program tuition, dormitory and cafeteria expenses, a copy of the SciTech 2015 proceedings, a complete health insurance plan, and all excursions during the program. Airfare is not included.

We are grateful that, through the generosity of the Ron and Maria Wolf Fund of the Bernard and Norton Wolf Family Foundation, we are able to offer a limited number of tuition scholarships.

For information, please check the SciTech website, www.scitech.technion.ac.il or contact Hershel Recht at the Technion Canada office, 416-789-4545.

Sephardi ex-journalist is third Tory hopeful in Mount Royal

JANICE ARNOLD

Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney introduced Mount Royal Conservative candidate hopeful Pascale Déry as a member of a younger generation whom his party would like to see representing Montreal in the government.

Déry described herself as "the new face of Conservatism," which she hopes will help change the party's image in Quebec.

Déry, 38, a political newcomer who was a journalist for 13 years with the French-language television networks TVA and LCN, officially launched her bid for the Conservative nomination on Jan. 21 at a Côte des Neiges community centre.

She is the third prominent Conservative hopeful in Mount Royal, which has been Liberal for 75 years, in the federal election that's expected to be held on Oct. 19. Political veterans Robert Libman, 54, and Beryl Wajsman, 60, announced their intentions this past fall.

Neither received the kind of high-level endorsement from the party that Déry is enjoying. At least three members of the party executive were among the approximately 200 people who attended her kickoff.

Several prominent members of the Sephardi community, of which Déry is a member, were also present, including Sylvain Abitbol, president of the Communauté Sépharade unifiée du Québec.

Déry stressed that while the Jewish community is a strong component of the riding, Mount Royal has changed, and many ethnic and religious groups, including Lebanese, Filipinos and Muslims, now call it home. Her audience reflected that multicultural composition.

Déry, a Côte St. Luc resident, said it was a difficult decision to resign from her prominent TV job and, as the mother of two young children, to enter politics.

"Some might say I am taking a big risk," she said. "Yes, but it is a risk worth taking."

The fact that she is a woman and a mother is a major factor in her decision, she said. The Conservatives are devoted to the economy and creating employment and to supporting families, and that's important for Mount Royal, because it's not the "rich riding" many perceive, she said.

"There is also a lot of inequality. The best way out of poverty is to have a job," Déry said.

Under Prime Minister Stephen Harper, she said, "Canada is recognized around the world as a model of economic and social development."

Touching on foreign policy, Déry said, "It is not surprising that Canada stands shoulder to shoulder with Israel. This should not be a surprise to anyone because our countries are built on the same values."

She noted that 20 per cent of Israel's population is Muslim.

She later told the media that, although she is proudly Jewish and admires Harper's pro-Israel stance, "that is not the only reason I am running."

Jews represent about 30 per cent of the riding's population, she said, and there is great diversity among the rest.

Asked how she'll overcame the fact that she's not well known among anglophones, Déry said "We can't have these language barriers anymore."

She said the party needs "new blood" in Quebec, where it holds only five seats and none on the Island of Montreal. Her lack of past political involvement is an asset, she believes.

Blaney, who represents the Quebec City area riding of Lévis-Bellechasse, said he hopes to see Déry serving "in the heart of government… We need to put Montreal back at the centre of decision-making."

Déry said she is prepared to debate her more politically experienced opponents. Libman is a former Côte St. Luc mayor and Montreal executive committee member, and earlier was leader and MNA for the Equality Party. Wajsman, a newspaper editor, is a former federal Liberal organizer and was executive assistant to current Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler.

Anthony Housefather, who was chosen as the Mount Royal Liberal candidate in November, said he would rather have Déry than Libman as his opponent, because he thinks her low profile among anglophones is a disadvantage. According to his figures, 78 per cent of the riding is primarily English speaking.

On hand to support Déry was her father William Déry, who in 1984, then a leader in the Sephardi community, unsuccessfully sought the Liberal nomination in Mount Royal. He noted that he was also 38 then. A few years later, he tried and failed to secure the Liberal nomination in St. Laurent. ■

Open Canada's doors to French Jews, Montreal rabbi urges after Paris trip

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Rabbi Adam Scheier, right, met with Rabbi Moshe Sebbag at the Grande Synagogue de Paris. Rabbi Scheier was in France Jan. 13-15 to show solidarity with French Jews.

After a whirlwind two-day trip to Paris in the wake of the recent terrorist attacks there, Rabbi Adam Scheier is convinced that Canada, and particularly Quebec, must do more to help French Jews immigrate here if they wish to do so.

Rabbi Scheier, spiritual leader of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim and president of the interdenominational Montreal Board of Rabbis, said almost everyone he met in the Jewish community there knows someone who wants to leave France.

One of his goals was to gauge if they considered Canada an option.

"They are hearing a lot from Israel, and a little from the United States, but nothing from Canada," he discovered. "They know Canada and Quebec, and its Jewish community, think it would be wonderful, but do not know it's an option."

Rabbi Scheier said the Canadian Jewish community should overcome any reluctance it has to appearing to be competing with Israel, which is actively and openly seeking olim in France, and do more to let French Jews know they are wanted here.

The Jews of France are a "besieged community," he believes, and the community here has a "moral responsibility" to do what it can to welcome them.

"The reality is not every Jew is going to go to Israel," he said. "Where one lives is a very personal decision."

Because of common language and culture, Quebec would be a logical destination, and, of course, the Montreal community, which has been in decline for many years, would benefit from a replenishing of its numbers, he said.

In recent years, by observation, it would appear a significant number of French Jews have settled in Montreal, although no statistics are available.

Rabbi Scheier is in accord with his good friend Rabbi Shmuel Herzfeld of the Ohev Sholom National Synagogue in Washington, D.C. The latter is urging the U.S. to open its doors to French Jews, citing the tragic fate of many Jews who were unable to find a safe haven at the onset of World War II because North America was closed to them.

"There is momentum in the U.S. to reactivate the 1990 Lautenberg Amendment, which facilitated immigration for the beleaguered Jews of the Soviet Union," said Rabbi Scheier. "A similar initiative should be undertaken in Canada, in particular in Quebec."

He noted over the past five years the Shaar Hashomayim has welcomed a significant number of French immigrants, and French is now heard in that synagogue increasingly.

A few weeks ago, the shul held its first Sephardi Shabbat service – in French, and there was a lecture in French.

There are an estimated 550,000 Jews in France. A record number – nearly 7,000 – made aliyah in 2014.

Rabbi Scheier's Paris trip from Jan. 13 to 15 was intended to show his and his congregation's solidarity with the Jews of France. There he joined with his rebbe and teacher, Rabbi Avi Weiss and Rabba Sara Hurwitz, both of the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale in New York, and Rabbi Yehuda Sarna of New York University.

He met with rabbinical and lay leadership, and many ordinary Jews. He also led an emotional prayer vigil outside the Hyper Cacher kosher supermarket where four hostages were killed on Jan. 9.

Rabbi Scheier said he asked everyone he met whether they believed there is a future for Jews in France. The answers were not simple, given the community's long history in and deep attachment to France.

"I spent time with former members of the Shaar who are now living in Paris and deeply conflicted about their future there," he said.

Overall, he described the mood in the Paris Jewish community as sad and fearful. As a pharmacist he met told him, "Everyone I know is planning on leaving – it's just too dangerous to be a Jew in France."

Rabbi Scheier concludes that, "Paris is a city on edge, waiting for the next attack to emerge from the Islamic extremist population."

Seeing about 15 soldiers carrying large guns as they guarded children at a Jewish kindergarten playing indoors because they were not permitted out in the schoolyard spoke volumes for Rabbi Scheier.

Howard Berger, co-director of Agence Ometz, the Federation CJA agency responsible for immigration services, said a meeting was scheduled for last week to discuss the situation of French Jews.

Berger said Ometz makes no special outreach to the Jews of France, but welcomes them and assists them as it would any other Jews wishing to settle here.

The agency has seen a higher than average number of inquiries lately, noticeable even in the past few weeks, about immigrating from France. "That, of course, does not mean they will come here," he said. ■

WWII vet to receive U.S. Congressional Gold Medal

plungen@thecjn.ca

In 1944, during the battle of Anzio, south of Rome, Allied soldiers are said to have come across the journal of a dead German lieutenant from the Herman Goering Division. Perusing the document, they found a reference to "the Black Devils," the name given by the German officer to Allied soldiers who had painted their faces black with shoe polish.

"The Black Devils are all around us every time we come into the line," the officer had written.

Allied soldiers liked the way they had brought fear to the hearts of their enemies and soon they adopted the name, The Devil's Brigade.

Consisting of Canadian and American troops formally operating as the First Special Service Force (FSSF), the commandos were featured in a 1968 Hollywood film, The Devil's Brigade.

In Toronto, veteran Morris Lazarus has a particular interest in the special forces unit. Perhaps in the movie as well.

"Have you seen the film?" he is asked.

"Seen it? I was in it," Lazarus quickly replied, referring not to the film but to the commando unit itself.

Lazarus is 95 and still quite spry. He proudly wears a navy blue jacket decorated with medals he earned as a sergeant in the Devil's Brigade. He's got a book of the unit's history and he shows off a Certificate of Recognition signed by Prime Minister Stephen Harper in

He'll soon accept another accolade when he joins fellow veterans in Washington, D.C. on Feb. 3 to be feted by members of Congress and receive the Congressional Gold Medal.

"It was the only unit formed in World War II with troops from the United States and Canada – building on the special bond between the two countries," said House Speaker John Boehner in a statement. "The unit was instrumental in targeting military and industrial installations. The Congressional Gold Medal is the highest civilian honour the United States Congress can bestow."

Lazarus was one of a handful of Jews who were part of the unit, which numbered 1,800 men in all and which suffered very high attrition rates throughout its service. It was created in 1942 and disbanded in December 1944, but during its lifespan, the unit saw action in the Aleutian Islands of Alaska, in Italy and southern France. Recruits were actively sought among lumberjacks, outdoorsmen, miners and tough guys who would fight behind enemy lines.

It is credited with never losing a battle in which it fought, for inflicting 12,000 German casualties, and capturing some 7,000 prisoners. Its emblem was a native spearhead, with the names Canada and U.S.A. crossing in the middle. The unit had cards printed featuring the insignia along with the words "The worst is yet to come" printed in red which would be left on the bodies of dead Germans as a form of psychological warfare.

Lazarus, who was born in Saskatchewan, recalled his first action in the battle for Monte La Difensa in December 1943. The FSSF used the special training that they had received in winter, and mountain warfare to scale the Italian mountain and overcome the Germans at the top.

Asked about the battle, Lazarus recalls carrying 10 grenades with him – more than the other soldiers – and that it was quite gruelling to climb the mountain. His commanding sergeant, he said, "was tough as nails.

"We went in and attacked the Germans and we took the mountain. We lost a goodly number of our men, but we also eradicated a goodly number of the enemy. That was our first big battle," he said.

Though his memory isn't quite what it used to be, Lazarus also recalls participating in the battle of Anzio, the Allied landing south of Rome that was designed to outflank the Germans to the south.

He was part of a group from the FSSF who were first into liberated Rome in June 1944 and he has a special fondness for an incident involving a contessa, an Italian countess, who asked him and his mates to dinner at her castle. "My guys were not too courteous," the elderly gentleman now concedes.

Though he jokes he was barely more than 100 pounds in those days, Lazarus recalls being asked by the contessa for help in preventing a group of hooligans from stealing her car. Gallant gentleman that he was, Lazarus left the dinner, found the would-be thieves, and told them in a polite yet firm tone, "You better leave here or I'll blow you all to hell." And they did.

According to one report, there are only 46 Americans, 29 Canadians and one Australian remaining from the unit.

In a few days, Lazarus will join other Black Devils veterans to receive another award to add to his collection.

The Congressional Gold Medal is the highest civilian honour bestowed by the U.S. Congress. Fewer than 150 of the medals have been awarded since the first was given to George Washington. Among the recipients are the Tuskegee Airmen, Gen. Douglas MacArthur and, the Doolittle Tokyo raiders.

Lazarus was in select company in 1944. It looks like he is still in very select company more than 70 years later. ■

La Presse 'shylock' reference 'unacceptable', CIJA says

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

The Montreal daily newspaper La Presse continued to use the term "shylock" in a series of articles on loan sharking in Quebec despite an objection from the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

The series "Les Nouveaux Shylocks" was featured prominently on the front page of the Jan. 19 edition and continued on pages 2 and 3. The four articles, all with "shylock" in the headline and in the text, were still available online as late as Jan. 21.

Luciano Del Negro, CIJA's Quebec vice-president, said the term is unacceptable because it is "demeaning and degrading" to Jews.

Del Negro said there is a proper French word usurier (usurer), which could have been used.

No apparently Jewish individuals are cited in the articles. The series investigates the pervasiveness today of loan sharking over the Internet and the powerlessness of the police to control it.

Del Negro said he is not satisfied with this explanation and says it does not befit a newspaper that claims to be the largest French-language daily in North America. La Presse cites a circulation of more than 200,000.

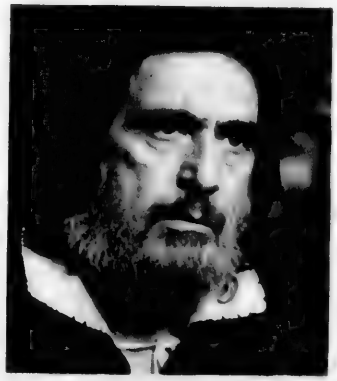
He thinks the paper is "trying to be obtuse" in refusing to acknowledge the racism implicit in the term "shylock."

He recalled a similar argument with La Presse over the word "nègre," in which the paper insisted this was a correct term for a black person.

"It's unsettling. It shows a lack of sensitivity to these matters," Del Negro said.

In response to a request from The CJN for comment, the series' author, La Presse staff reporter Hugo Meunier emailed that "at no time did the use of the word 'shylock' aim to hurt in any way the Jewish community.

"In fact, the word 'Jewish' did not appear anywhere in the article and the use of the term shylock has been common for a long time in Quebec to designate usurious lenders who demand astronomical rates and use rather unorthodox, sometimes violent, methods," he added.



Al Pacino as Shylock in a 2004 Hollywood adaptation of The Merchant of Venice.

"The police use it [shylock], even the people I met in doing the reporting use it. No one, however, made a reference to the Jewish community in using it, I can assure you.

"I elsewhere indicated the origin of the term, referring to the character in a Shakespeare play. If I did not mention that he was of Jewish origin, that is above all because I had no idea, like my colleagues at La Presse."

The series did include a sidebar explaining the origin of "shylock," saying it comes from Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice and is the name of "an unscrupulous banker."

"In the play, the usurer Shylock signs a contract with the merchant Antonio authorizing him to take a pound of flesh in the event of non-payment," the article stated.

Del Negro points out that there was no mention of the anti-Semitic overtones of the character, which the Stratford Festival, for example, takes pains to put into context whenever it stages the play.

He said CIJA has made its point to La Presse and does not plan any further action. ■

Stifling speech lets received wisdom become prejudice

I found his tweets, joking about Jews and ovens, disgusting. But I think his point about speech is right. The malicious and horrible nature of the Holocaust is exactly the sort of received wisdom that is too important for us to allow to become simply a prejudice that is held without meaning or conviction. Yet if questioning the Holocaust, or making light of it in offensive ways, becomes a crime – words that simply may not be spoken – then the truth of the Holocaust's horror is no longer something that must be thought about actively and defended passionately.

Yes, that's right: as Mill put it, freedom of thought for falsehoods helps keep truth alive.

Here, in Mill's words, is what happens when a true belief isn't tested: "When it has come to be an hereditary creed, and to be received passively, not actively—when the mind is no longer compelled, in the same degree as at first, to exercise its vital powers on the questions which its belief presents to it, there is a progressive tendency to forget all of the belief except the formularies, or to give it a dull and torpid assent, as if accepting it on trust dispensed with the necessity of realizing it in consciousness, or testing it by personal experience; until it almost ceases to connect itself at all with the inner life of the human being."

People reacted in different ways to Reddick's tweets. Several Dalhousie students fought the offensive expression with expression of their own. One launched a Facebook campaign urging students to boycott the Dawgfather's stand, and others gave out free kosher hotdogs with the option for takers to donate to a Holocaust education charity. These actions have generated healthy debate and discussion. Another person reacted by complaining to the police, who are now investigating Reddick for hate crimes. That action has the potential not only to shut down debate and create a martyr out of Reddick, but also to enfeeble the power of the Holocaust to make people think and evoke real heartfelt conviction.

We have a similar situation in France, where comedian Dieudonné M'bala M'bala was arrested and prosecuted for being an "apologist for terror" because he posted on Facebook after the Paris Unity March that he felt "like Charlie Coulibaly," a reference to one of the Paris gunmen.

Logic tells us that Dieudonné's prosecution is likely to give extremists far more inspiration than his initial post. Given that the French public will now apparently be completely shielded from Dieudonné's brand of anti-Semitic opinion, they will have lost a chance to cultivate the understanding behind the religious tolerance on which the censorship is based. As will we all. ■

Hate speech expresses an emotion, not a thought

Sometimes we get a better sense of what is true by hearing what is false. Blasphemy can serve this purpose. A mis-characterization of any religion becomes an opportunity to explain what that religion truly is.

Hate speech serves no similar purpose. For example, we do not need to hear Holocaust denial to better understand the existence of the Holocaust or to hear that a minority controls the world to become more keenly aware of the disadvantaged situation of minorities. We do not need to hear hate speech to keep our belief in equality alive.

More generally, we protect freedom of expression to explain our ideas or to communicate information. Blasphemy can serve this purpose, thus developing religious thought. What is blasphemy for one religion is doctrine for another. Prohibiting blasphemy means stultifying the development of spiritual discussion.

Some believers, in an effort to inflate their own importance, inflate the importance of their beliefs beyond reason. Blasphemy is an antidote, a deflater, a pinprick in the balloon of the overblown egos of some believers.

In contrast, hate is an emotion not a thought. Jean Paul Sartre has written: "The anti-Semite has chosen hate because hate is a faith; at the outset he has chosen to devaluate words and reasons".

> Freedom of expression is necessary for democracy. However, tolerance is also essential for democracy

Freedom of expression is necessary for democracy. However, tolerance is also essential for democracy. Hate speech tears at the fabric of democracy by fomenting hatred of the majority against the minority.

David Matas

A law against blasphemy is a law against preventing offence. A system that prohibits differences which offend is a repressive system, not a democratic system.

Prohibiting incitement to hatred attempts to protect society from the lunatic fringe, those who are susceptible to incitement and prone to act out whether through discrimination or violence. Prohibiting blasphemy is directed at protecting society from a far larger group, those who hold spiritual beliefs.

Democratic society must protect itself from the lunatic fringe. In contrast, if large segments of our society, those with spiritual beliefs, are unhinged, we are beyond hope. Prohibiting blasphemy is predicated on intolerance, that those whose beliefs are blasphemed will not and cannot tolerate the blasphemy. A prohibition of blasphemy is an abandonment of the hope of tolerance. ■

Netanyahu says he'll 'go anywhere' to speak against Iran

AVI LEWIS
JERUSALEM

In a rebuff to growing criticism from the White House, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu indicated last Sunday he would go ahead with his plan to speak before the U.S. Congress in Washington on March 3 about Iranian sanctions.

Netanyahu told his cabinet he would go anywhere to push Israel's position that sanctions against Tehran should be toughened to stymie its nuclear program.

"As prime minister of Israel, I am obligated to make every effort in order to prevent Iran from achieving nuclear weapons that would be aimed at the State of Israel. This effort is worldwide, and I will go anywhere I am invited in order to enunciate the State of Israel's position and in order to defend its future and its existence," Netanyahu said Sunday.

Netanyahu has come under fire for accepting an invitation from House Speaker John Boehner to speak about Iran and radical Islam, in what has been seen as a snub of U.S. President Barack Obama.

Administration officials have expressed anger over the visit, saying it is a politically motivated breach of protocol, coming just before Israeli elections scheduled for March 17.

The speech comes amid a battle in Congress over a bill that would ramp up sanctions on Iran. Officials in the United States, Iran and elsewhere have said that raising penalties on Tehran could derail sensitive talks over its nuclear program, and Obama has vowed to veto the measure.

According to an Israeli radio report Sunday, members of Netanyahu's Likud party were briefed to emphasize in media interviews that a supermajority vote of 67 Senate representatives has the power to overrule the U.S. presidential veto – hinting at Netanyahu's intentions to back Congress against Obama.

"In the coming weeks, the superpowers will reach a framework agreement with Iran – an agreement that would allow Iran to keep its capabilities as a nuclear threshold state – which primarily endangers the existence of the State of Israel," Netanyahu said at the cabinet meeting Sunday.

"Iran must not be allowed to acquire nuclear weapons," he said.

Netanyahu's planned visit to Washington in March was not co-ordinated with the White House or State Department, in a sign of the nadir in ties between the Israeli and U.S. administrations.

Obama and Secretary of State John Kerry said they will not meet with Netanyahu when he visits Washington next month.

Netanyahu is staunchly opposed to any deal that will see the United States ease sanctions on Tehran over its nuclear weapons program, and has called previous agreements "historic mistakes."

Israel and the United States are close allies, but personal relations between Obama and Netanyahu have reportedly deteriorated over the years.

The pair have publicly clashed over Israeli settlement building in the West Bank and about how to tackle Iran's disputed nuclear program.

Obama's allies fear Netanyahu's March trip could be used by Israel and Republicans to rally opposition to a nuclear deal, undercutting years of sensitive negotiations just as they appear poised to bear fruit.

In November, the already faltering ties between the leaders were served a new blow when an anonymous U.S. official was quoted as calling Netanyahu a "chickenshit," in an article published by journalist Jeffrey Goldberg in the American magazine The Atlantic. The article portrayed the rift between the United States and Israel as a "full-blown crisis." ■

Arab parties unite ahead of upcoming elections

ADIV STERMAN
JERUSALEM

Israel's Arab parties, Balad and Ra'am-Ta'al, signed a unity deal and merged with the socialist, Arab-Jewish Hadash. A joint list for the future Arab-majority faction was reportedly finalized on Jan. 23.

The party will be headed by Haifa attorney Ayman Odeh, who was elected head of Hadash, the Democratic Front for Peace and Equality. He will be followed on the list by Ra'am-Ta'al representative Masud Ghnaim and Balad head Jamal Zahalka, respectively, according to the Sicha Mekomit activist website.

MK Ahmad Tibi (Ra'am-Ta'al), who was considered a favourite to lead the unified slate, will be placed in the new party's fourth slot, and Balad MK Hanin Zoabi, a firebrand lawmaker who faces the prospect of a trial for insulting policemen in July 2014, will place seventh on the list.

Hadash MK Dov Khenin, the only Jewish representative of his party, will be eighth on the new roster.

Legislators from Ra'am-Ta'al and Balad have been hard at work overcoming their own deep ideological differences and constructing a shared "pan-Arab" list that might stand a better chance of passing the 3.25 per cent electoral threshold for Knesset seats (up from two per cent) which passed into law last year.

Hadash and Ra'am-Ta'al each currently hold four seats, and Balad holds three, for a total of 11 seats. Polls show the united slate gaining as many as 12 seats in the March election.

Israel's Arab-majority political parties reportedly rejected an offer by Isaac Herzog, head of the Zionist Camp faction – the joint Labor-Hatnua list – to join a potential coalition led by him should he win the premiership in March's national elections.

Channel 10 reported last Friday night that Herzog approached several leaders of the Arab parties to verify if such a deal was possible. Herzog's office confirmed that such discussions took place but said the details were "incorrect," claiming Tibi of Ra'am-Ta'al-Mada approached the Labor leader and not the other way around.

According to Channel 10, Tibi said Herzog had spoken to him and Mohammad Barakeh, a member of the Arab-Jewish Communist party Hadash, several weeks ago about the possibility of joining a Zionist Camp-led coalition. Tibi indicated that the two told Herzog it could not be done but did not rule out supporting the coalition from outside in exchange for the allocation of budgets for their constituencies.

This form of tacit support was made popular during the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's rule in the early 1990s when he increased spending on education, health and child allowances in the Arab sector and put in action a plan to boost the number of Arab citizens in the civil service. Arab parties have traditionally refused to formally join coalitions led by Jewish-Israeli parties. ■

A year in the army

Sagi Melamed

On our way to synagogue Friday evening, I asked him, "So what did you do this week?"

"Drop it Dad. Please. I am exhausted."

"Guy, I know your military service is physically and mentally arduous. You jump, dive, run and climb. You are constantly being tested and evaluated. You carry heavy physical loads. But don't forget that your family also carries a load. We're carrying a heavy emotional load every step of your way, so please understand and include us."

What was our family load this past year, since Guy has been in the army?

Few injuries and health-related issues. After his first few months in the army, he said, "Dad, I learned that in the army you acquire three things: friends, experiences and health problems."

One war in Gaza. Two friends killed in battle. The second time I got hold of him to tell him the bitter news, his first words were, "Who is it this time, Dad?"

Dealing with obsessive thoughts. Sending him positive mental energy from afar. At any moment of the day, guessing what he's doing and where he is.

At the Western Wall during the swearing-in ceremony, hearing "I swear!" declared in unison by hundreds of young, motivated soldiers. An emotional tear dropping, even from the eyes of supposedly tough fathers.

An intimate ceremony at the end of the medics' course. Parents wondering why they play the Medic's Ballad repeatedly, since in the song, the heroic medic ends up getting killed.

Chronic exhaustion. Wanting to use every spare moment to nap, but also wanting to enjoy the free time and not "waste all of the Sabbath sleeping, because I can sleep on the way back to base."

Going back to his base on Saturday night. Just starting to catch up on sleep and caloric intake, then 36 hours after stepping off the base, returning to the demanding reality of the army.

Occasional Friday morning visits to a base somewhere in the south, when his unit stayed for Shabbat and parental visits were permitted. Travelling four hours to spend one hour with him.

Wanting the keys to Dad's car before Shabbat, to visit his girlfriend. My usual question: "Did you sleep enough to drive safely?" His usual reply: "Dad, the army insists on that."

His favourite foods, prepared every Shabbat he gets home. First dibs on the ice cream.

His little sister's incomprehension of him getting extra pampering, even after hearing his stories. The army is far away, but the ice cream is right here.

Sending him kilos of dried fruit, chocolates, cakes: by mail, in his bag, with friends. Anything that can make his life sweeter. Buying supplies: knife, flashlights, batteries, navigation markers, thermal underwear, shoes, socks… whatever is needed and permitted.

Wondering where he is during the rainiest week of winter, and whether the army would train in such stormy weather, just to find out at the end of the week: "On the worst day of the storm we practised swimming in the sea and performing rescues in high waves."

At the end of his first year of training, during the week that's considered one of the toughest, we were not in Israel and had to send him our positive energies from far away. During Shabbat at my friend Robert's, Robert asked, "Do Guy and his friends understand the historic, Jewish and Zionist significance of their military service?"

"I believe so. Not all of them. Not all the time. But in general, even if not expressed in words – they understand."

A week later, we were with friends in Boston. Around the table were some American students from elite universities. Our teenage children, Eden and Ari, were impressed: "Harvard, MIT. Very impressive. And they're hardly older than Guy."

"Kids," I said afterward, "remember that to a large extent, those nice Jewish boys in Boston have the opportunity to excel and go to the best universities in the U.S., thanks to the service of your brother and his friends and, in the not too distant future, also thanks to your service." ■

Journalist who broke Nisman story flees

JTA
BUENOS AIRES

The Argentine-Israeli journalist who first reported the death of Argentine prosecutor Alberto Nisman has fled to Israel following threats to his safety.

Damian Pachter, who works for BuenosAiresHerald.com and tweeted the news of Nisman's Jan. 18 death, left Argentina last Saturday after threats and being followed by people he did not know, according to Fopea, the Argentine Journalism Forum. Pachter was en route to Israel, where he holds dual citizenship.

"I will return when my sources tell me that the conditions changed," Pachter told an Argentine publication. "I don't think that I will be there during this government."

Nisman was found dead of a gunshot wound in his home shortly before he was to present evidence that Argentine President Cristina Kirchner covered up Iran's role in the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish centre in Buenos Aires.

Argentina's major Jewish institutions planned to boycott the country's official Holocaust Memorial Day ceremony this year in order to protest Nisman's death.

Alberto Nisman was found dead on Jan. 18.

Leaders of AMIA and several other Jewish organizations said they would not participate in the government-organized event to be held Jan. 27. Several officials who asked not to be identified cited prosecutor Alberto Nisman's suspicious death on Jan. 18 and the information in his 300-page criminal complaint as reasons for boycotting the ceremony.

According to Nisman's complaint, Argentina's government signed a deal with Iran to hide Iran's role in the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish centre in Buenos Aires in exchange for commercial and oil benefits. The complaint says President Cristina Kirchner and Foreign Minister Hector Timerman "took the criminal decision of inventing Iran's innocence to satisfy commercial, political and geopolitical interests of the Argentine republic."

Last week 3,000 people attended a protest at the rebuilt AMIA headquarters in Buenos Aires, AMIA officials reported. At the rally, organized by AMIA and DAIA (Delegation of Argentine Jewish Associations), protesters demanded "truth and justice" from the government. During the rally, when DAIA president Julio Schlosser noted that 85 people had been killed in the AMIA attack, people in the crowd shouted "86," a reference to Nisman. The number 86 has become shorthand on social media to refer to Nisman's death. No one from the government or the ruling parties attended the Buenos Aires rally.

In Israel, 250 Argentine Jews, including a woman who identified herself as Nisman's cousin, attended a protest on Jan. 23 at the Argentine Embassy in Tel Aviv. Several held placards reading "Yo soy Nisman," Spanish for "I am Nisman."

The organizations said they would hold their own Holocaust memorial ceremony at the rebuilt AMIA headquarters on the morning of Jan. 27. ■

USCJ selling its Manhattan office

JTA
NEW YORK

The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism is selling its New York office.

The organization announced last week that it has signed a contract to sell its two-floor condo in midtown Manhattan for $15.9 million (all figures US). Proceeds from the sale of the Second Avenue property will go toward paying down its debt, renting new office space and establishing a foundation to fund ongoing programs, the United Synagogue said.

The United Synagogue is the 102-year-old congregational arm of the Conservative movement. It has taken a financial hit in recent years as Conservative synagogues have shut down, merged with other Conservative or Reform congregations, or pulled out of the congregational group for practical, financial or ideological reasons. The group now has about 600 member synagogues, down from 630 synagogues in 2013 and 675 in 2009. In 1985, it had about 850 synagogues.

Bus driver recalls stabbing attack

JUSTIN JALIL
TEL AVIV

Herzl Biton, the driver who fought a Palestinian terrorist during a stabbing attack on a Tel Aviv bus on Jan. 21 in which 17 people were injured, recalled the fierce struggle between the two as the attack was underway.

"I had no choice. I had to save the passengers. He stabbed me while I was driving and then went to the centre of the bus and began stabbing passengers," Biton said in a conversation, aired last Saturday on Channel 10, with the CEO of the Dan bus company where he works. Biton said he began swerving the bus from side to side in order to alert others outside of the ongoing 7:30 a.m. attack. His maneuvering, however, did not prevent the assailant from moving throughout the bus and hurting passengers, he said.

"I had no choice but to bring him back over to me. I slammed on the brakes and he flew towards me like a bird. I then jumped out of the chair, grabbed his left hand and started to spray him with pepper spray," continued Biton.

The terrorist, Hamza Matrouk from the West Bank refugee camp of Tulkarem, was resolute in his attack and did not stop after Biton charged him, he said: "I punched him and he punched me back."

Amidst the struggle with the 23-year-old attacker, Biton, 62, managed to get the doors of the bus open, enabling passengers to flee. "There was a pool of blood next to me and he slipped. He left the bus and started running in the direction of Yitzhak Sadeh street. I got off the bus and started chasing him," added Biton.

Matrouk chased after passengers and pedestrians following his rampage on the bus, stabbing a woman who escaped the turmoil. He was later shot and apprehended by the police. He remains hospitalized at Wolfson Medical Center in Bat Yam.

Last Saturday, a video of the hospitalized Matrouk circulated on social media, in which an unidentified person, wielding a camera phone, walks up to him and tells him to "smile for the camera, you shit." The incident constituted a serious security breach, as Matrouk is supposed to be under heavy guard as an intelligence asset to the Shin Bet (Israel's Security Agency). The Shin Bet told Channel 2 the agency was not responsible for Matrouk's security, blaming police for the breach, who in turn blamed military police.

Matrouk was reported to have illegally crossed from the West Bank into Israel several days before the attack, and told interrogators that he carried it out in retaliation for Israel's Operation Protective Edge in Gaza last summer and the recent unrest on the Temple Mount. He also said that he was motivated by watching radical Islamic television programs, and spoke of "reaching paradise."

Biton, who was in critical condition following the stabbing, underwent life-saving surgery at Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv, where he is currently recuperating.

Rafael Shmuel, the CEO of the Dan bus company that operates Line 40, commended Biton for his actions. "We are very proud of you and all that you have done. A simply heroic act. Have a speedy recovery. All of us here at the Dan family and myself are with you."■

Proceeds from sale go to new projects, paying off debt

In 2011 and 2012, United Synagogue ran a cumulative budget deficit of $6 million, and for the last two fiscal years the cumulative deficit has amounted to about $2.8 million. This year's projected budget deficit is $600,000, a spokesperson told JTA.

In 2013, United Synagogue said it was shutting down Koach, the movement's college outreach organization. And not long ago, the Conservative movement's network of Solomon Schechter schools, which has seen its own ranks shrink over the last decade and a half from 63 schools to about 40, dropped its affiliation with United Synagogue.

In a statement, the United Synagogue described the sale of its office as part of a strategy adopted three years ago to cut expenses, expand philanthropic support and focus on core functions to meet the needs of member congregations.

Rabbi Steven Wernick, United Synagogue's CEO, said owning real estate is not essential to the organization's core mission.

"We'll invest these resources instead in people, in innovation, and in our kehillot, our sacred communities, with whom we are reimagining Judaism for the 21st century," Wernick said in a statement.

United Synagogue spokesperson Andrea Glick, said the organization was planning to rent office space in lower Manhattan. That would put it even farther from the flagship institution of the movement, the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, which is located in upper Manhattan, near Harlem.

Asked whether the United Synagogue considered moving its staff of about 50 to JTS, Glick said only that the United Synagogue explored many alternatives, including the Interfaith Center of New York and sharing space with other Jewish organizations.

"Either space was not available or did not meet our needs," Glick said.

Under New York state law, the office sale must be approved by a vote of member congregations. That will take place in February or March, the United Synagogue said. If approved, the move likely would take place in August or September.

Board members plan to spend a significant portion of the proceeds from the office's sale to create a "Fund for the Future," that will "support USCJ's congregational programs, seed innovative initiatives, and provide capital reserves," the organization's statement said.■

World governments called on to fight anti-Semitism

JTA
WASHINGTON

The first United Nations General Assembly meeting on anti-Semitism showed "a consensus in the international community" on the seriousness of the issue, according to Samantha Power, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Speaking to a telephone press briefing from New York during last Thursday's conference, called by 37 member states in the shadow of growing anti-Jewish attacks in Europe, Power called on governments and civil society to battle anti-Semitism, which is seeing "an upsurge around the world."

As part of the American fight against anti-Semitism, President Barack Obama will host a meeting next month at the White House, she said.

In a separate statement about the UN meeting, Obama cited the deadly Paris attack earlier this month on a kosher supermarket as underscoring the gathering's importance.

"Anti-Semitic attacks like the recent terrorist attack on a kosher supermarket in Paris pose a threat that extends beyond the Jewish community," he said. "They also threaten the values we hold dear – pluralism, diversity, and the freedoms of religion and expression.

Ira Forman, the administration's special envoy to monitor and combat anti-Semitism, said on the call that the United States is in "an ongoing conversation" with its allies about security for Jewish communities.

"You can't put Europe in one box. Each has a different security situation," he said.■

Two-month spotlight on Israeli culture

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Following the success of last year's inaugural Spotlight on Israeli Culture, a two-month showcase of Israeli music, theatre, film, dance and visual arts, the event has gained momentum by partnering with a number of new venues across Toronto.

"Last year was very successful. Most of the shows were sold out or mostly sold out. We had packed houses," said Cheryl Wetstein, the executive director of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, the group that organized the event.

"It was wonderful and it did what we wanted it to do, which was to say, here is all this Israeli culture, look how great it is and look how accomplished these performers are."

Following last year's success, Wetstein has been working with a number of organizations, including Israel's Office of Cultural Affairs of the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto, to reach out to other cultural organizations in Toronto to join them in showcasing Israeli work throughout the city this February and March.

"This year, we've broadened our presenters. There are a lot of new presenters, including the Toronto Public Library, which is doing a film series, and the [Toronto Symphony Orchestra] has joined in," Wetstein said.

Other presenters include the Aga Khan Museum, Ashkenaz Foundation, Austrian Cultural Forum, Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, International Festival of Authors, Koffler Centre of the Arts, Miles Nadal JCC, and The Rex Jazz and Blues Bar.

Some of the highlights of the two-month showcase include a performance by pianist Yefim Bronfman and Maestro Pinchas Zuckerman. Zukerman will be making his final Toronto appearance at Roy Thomson Hall on Feb. 7, as the National Arts Centre Orchestra's music director.

On Feb. 9, Union Events will present singer-songwriter and "alt-rock folk-soul musician" Asaf Avidan to promote his new album Different Pulses.

"Asaf Avidan was scheduled to come last year, and at the last minute had to cancel because of visa issues, so he has rebooked for this year," Wetstein said.

Ashkenaz Foundation and the Aga Khan Museum are presenting an interfaith ensemble called Diwan Saz on March 12.

The group is made up of Jewish, Muslim, Christian and Bedouin musicians who aim to promote peace and co-existence through their music which is influenced by the sounds of Central Asia, Turkey, Persia, and Israel.

The Progress Festival and Koffler Centre of the Arts will present the North American premiere of Marathon, a live show that combines theatre and dance.

In an attempt to portray the challenges of living life in a constant state of emergency, three people literally run in circles on stage in this physically demanding performance from Israeli artist Aharona Israel.

Marathon is running from Feb. 4 to 6, and one of the three shows will be presented in Hebrew with English subtitles.

An art exhibit called Prayer by Israeli expatriate Dvora Barzilai, an observant Jew living in Vienna with her husband who is a cantor, will be presented by the Miles Nadal JCC and the Austrian Cultural Forum from Jan. 29 to Feb. 19.

The exhibit, which explores the Hebrew language using materials including gold leaf, tempera, sand, cement, ashes, oils and canvas, is centred on religion and Jewish tradition.

On March 16, an Israeli film series, presented by the Toronto Public Library and the Consulate General of Israel, will screen Aviva, My Love, a film about a hotel cook who is an unknown, but very talented writer. Matchmaker will be screened on Feb.15 and on March 23, there will be a screening of Jellyfish, a film which chronicles the lives of three secular Israeli women in Tel Aviv.

Wetstein said she's excited about the countless events taking place throughout the city.

"I'm really looking forward to spending my winter going to see theatre, art [and] music. If I have to be in Toronto in the winter, these are wonderful things to do," she said.

"Given the political climate for the past many, many years, the focus is always on the politics of Israel and not on the amazing, cultural accomplishments that have come out of Israel," she said. "There is a huge cultural energy there. A huge vibrant energy, and creativity coming out of Israel."

The Festival officially launches on Feb. 1 at a reception in the Julie M. Gallery in the Distillery. ■

Jazz singer identifies with her Jewish family

MARVIN GLASSMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jazz singer Sophia Perlman pays tribute in concert to the Jewish songwriters she admires.

In "The Jewish Experience on Broadway," Jan. 28, she performs with singers Alana Bridgewater, Dave Wall and pianist Marilyn Lerner at Hugh's Room in Toronto.

"The Broadway composers that meant more to me than anyone else are Gary Willis Friedman and Stephen Sondheim. I will be performing the songs from the musical theatre that they are both known for," Perlman said in an interview.

The show will also include Broadway standards by Irving Berlin, Leonard Bernstein, George Gershwin and Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein. Bridgewater will sing selections from Porgy and Bess, and Wall will sing songs from Annie Get Your Gun and West Side Story.

Although Perlman is Jewish only on her father's side of the family, she grew up in the Kensington Market area and identifies strongly as a cultural Jew.

"Like me, my father was also raised as a child of intermarriage between a Christian and a Jew, and he was raised in a Catholic school.

"I grew up as a spiritual person, learning all about the value of tzedakah, doing acts of kindness to others. Although I am uncomfortable about belonging to large organized synagogues, I was heavily influenced by the teachings of Jewish socialist Morris Winchevsky and my experiences in the summer at Camp Naivelt," she said.

A visit to the Jewish state increased her feeling of being Jewish. "I felt stronger about my Jewish identity once I visited Israel and [gained] a better understanding of the problems in the Middle East. I feel sad, as do many of us, that peace there seems to be a distant dream," said the 29-year-old singer.

> I grew up a spiritual person, learning all about the value of tzedakah, doing acts of kindness to others.

Perlman's socialist leanings could be traced to Ina Perlman, her paternal Jewish grandmother from South Africa, whom she paid tribute to in a 2013 concert.

"My grandmother was very much of an activist, working against apartheid in South Africa, which was the law in South Africa at the time. I am very proud of her beliefs and am inspired by her."

She picked up her love of music from both her parents, who wrote music and played piano, although they were not professional musicians.

Perlman explored the possibility of performing opera at first, and studied at the Royal Conservatory of Music through college, but fell in love with jazz after completing her jazz music studies at Humber College in 2007.

"Once I found out that there were few operas written for tenor singers, I became immersed in jazz and have no regrets. I formed my own band and think of myself as a collaborative musician, and I went forward with my career for the past five years."

She has recorded a few CDs and has started to make a name for herself in Canadian jazz circles, often touring across Canada with her husband, pianist Adrean Farrugia.

Perlman doesn't view herself as a commercial star and feels that, in spite of her success in Canada, it would be hard for her to duplicate the international success of Canadian Jewish jazz singers Sophie Milman and Nikki Yanofsky.

"Nikki and Sophie are both gifted, but also had support from influential people in jazz internationally. I view the beauty of my singing as collaborative and [try] to be improvisational in jazz. Whether my concerts and albums will make me popular outside of Canada is outside of my control. I really did not go into the music field to be rich and famous and am happy to perform and be loved locally." ■

Jazz singer Sophia Perlman teams with singers Alana Bridgewater, David Wall and pianist Marilyn Lerner for the "Jewish Experience on Broadway" concert Jan. 28, 8 p.m., at Hugh's Room, 2261 Dundas St. W., in Toronto. For tickets, call 416-531-8804 or go to www.hughsroom.com

Two New Music Prizes: The Azrieli Music Project, established to celebrate, foster and create opportunities for the performance of high quality new orchestral music on a Jewish theme or subject, has launched two new prizes, both worth $50,000.

The Azrieli Prize in Jewish Music is an international prize for a recently composed or performed work by a living composer; and the Azrieli Commissioning Competition is for a Canadian composer of any age. Both contests seek new works of Jewish orchestral music of 15 minutes duration or more, and are open to composers of all faiths, backgrounds and affiliations.

The Orchestre symphonique de Montréal will perform the winning works at a gala concert in Montreal in October 2016. See the website www.azrielifoundation music for further details.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Tu b'Shvat laden with delicious possibilities

JUDY BART KANCIGOR
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

We are soon celebrating Tu b'Shvat, the New Year of the trees, which begins at sundown on Feb. 3. Tu b'Shvat has a long and interesting history, and, for Jewish cooks, is laden with delicious possibilities.

Tu b'Shvat translates to the 15th day of the month of Shvat. But why do we celebrate this agricultural festival in the dead of winter? In ancient times in Israel, the holiday marked the end of the rainy season and thus closed the fiscal year for calculating taxes, the tithes (bikkurim, or "first fruits") offered to the priests.

With the destruction of the Temple and the exile and with none of our own fruit to tithe, the holiday went into dormancy, only to bloom again centuries later when talmudic rabbis used it to calculate the age of fruit-bearing trees and thus the proper date of harvest. After the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492, kabbalists in Safed infused the holiday with mystical significance.

It is customary to plan a Tu b'Shvat menu around the Seven Species (Shivat Haminim), the grains and fruits named in the Torah (Deuteronomy, 8:8), which were staples of our ancient ancestors: wheat, barley, grapes (and wine), figs, pomegranates, olives (and olive oil) and dates. (Note: The Bible actually refers to honey as the seventh of the these, meaning palm date honey, not honey produced by bees.)

Some communities observe a Tu b'Shvat seder (who can wait for Passover?), which includes the drinking of four cups of wine and readings from various Jewish sources. (For a guide to conducting your own Tu b'Shvat seder, go to hillel.org or mazon.org.)

Bread would be the obvious choice for including wheat, but the serving of couscous, popular in the Mediterranean since the Middle Ages, seems most appropriate for this holiday. Substitute bulgur for the couscous, if you like.

The pomegranate has been revered since biblical times as a symbol of fertility, good health and immortality. Celebrated by King Solomon in the Song of Songs, this tangy, many-seeded fruit with its crimson-hued, leathery shell was abundant in the Garden of Eden and is even thought by some scholars to have been the real "apple" that tempted Eve. The seeds of the pomegranate supposedly add up to 613, which represent the mitzvot (good deeds) of the Torah, but I don't know anyone who has tried to count them.

Remove the seeds under water and save your clothes. Or purchase the arils already seeded, if you can find them at some markets or online.

Pomegranate-Glazed Chicken

Pomegranate molasses (also called "paste" or "concentrate") can be found in Middle Eastern markets.

- ❑ 2 chickens, about 4 lb. each, cut into 6 pieces each, on the bone
- ❑ kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper
- ❑ olive oil

Glaze

- ❑ olive oil
- ❑ 2 garlic cloves, finely chopped
- ❑ 1 medium shallot, finely chopped
- ❑ 1/2 cup pomegranate molasses
- ❑ 3 tbsp. dark brown sugar
- ❑ 1 tbsp. tomato paste
- ❑ 1/4 cup dark chicken stock

Suggested garnishes

- ❑ fresh pomegranate seeds
- ❑ chopped fresh flat-leaf parsley

Preheat oven to 350. Season chicken pieces with salt and pepper.

Heat a large, deep sauté pan over medium-high heat, and lightly coat bottom of pan with olive oil. Brown chicken pieces on all sides, in batches, without crowding. When pieces are well browned (drumsticks and thighs will take longer than breast and wing pieces), transfer white and dark meat pieces to two separate baking dishes.

Make Glaze: Heat a small saucepan over medium-high heat, and lightly coat bottom of pan with olive oil. Sauté garlic and shallot until lightly browned. Add pomegranate molasses, sugar, tomato paste and stock. Lower heat to medium and cook, stirring, until well combined and glaze has thickened, about 10 minutes.

Brush chicken pieces with pomegranate glaze, and roast until cooked through and a thermometer inserted into thigh registers 160, 30 to 35 minutes for white meat and about 45 minutes for dark meat. Brush chicken with glaze halfway through cooking and again when removed from oven.

Serve chicken sprinkled with your choice of garnishes. Yield: 4 to 6 servings.

Post-apocalyptic tale depicts a dystopian society

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Max Glickman, the fictional Jewish cartoonist who is the narrator of Howard Jacobson's 2006 novel Kalooki Nights, freely admits that he views the Jewish People as "an immoderate, overemphatic people, much given to exaggeration," and adds: "So what? I call it giving value for money myself. You prick us so we bleed profusely."

In his most recent novel, titled simply J, Jacobson demonstrates his own bent for exaggeration for the sake of heightened narrative punch and punchlines. As a result, readers may find themselves "slogging through a landscape of papier-maché incredibility," as literary critic James Wood once observed about another of Jacobson's novels, The Finkler Question (2010).

At the heart of J is a terrible historical secret, a vast, unspeakable atrocity that a post-apocalyptic Britain has done its best to erase from the history books and from human memory. The thing, also sometimes scatalogically referred to as the "Great Pissaster," was apparently so bad that it has become known as "What Happened, If It Happened."

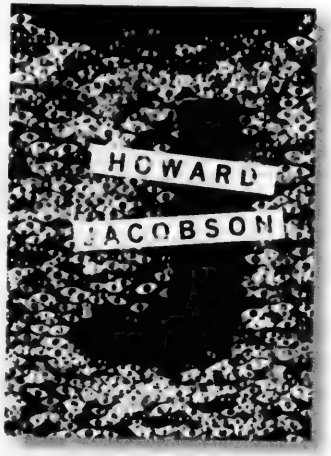
Because the letter "J" was somehow associated with this evil thing, the protagonist Kevern Coco Cohen, like his father before him, cannot pronounce that letter of the alphabet without compulsively drawing his fingers to his lips as though to suppress the sound. The impulse is also represented typographically: throughout the novel, the letter appears as a sort of self-effacing figure, with two tiny cross-hatches running through it.

In a totalitarian society reminiscent of George Orwell's 1984, Kevern Coco Cohen, an isolated, obsessive-compulsive woodcarver, falls in love with a quirky misfit named Ailinn Solomons in the nondescript seaside town of Port Reuben. Ailinn, bothered by a reference Kevern makes to her thick ankles, retorts that he has a thick brain to match – their romance is of the low variety, which happens to match her bleak opinion of love.

Jacobson omnisciently puts us inside the minds of Ailinn and his other darkly comic characters. Ailinn thinks: "What good came of love, when all was said and done? You fell in love and immediately thought about dying. Either because the person you had fallen for had a mind to kill you, or because he exceptionally didn't and then you dreaded being parted from him."

In something called the "Great Renaming," the people of this dystopia by the sea were assigned new names – Celtic-sounding first names and family names of a distinctly Jewish timbre (perhaps so that everyone will be discriminated against with equal irreverence). A parade of cartoonish characters with fanciful half-Jewish names march across the page with Dickensian abandon: Esme Nussbaum, Ythel Weinstock, Densdell Kroplik, Edward Everett Phineas Zermansky. When Kevern Cohen is swept into a bizarre murder mystery, the victim is Lowenna Morgenstern and the sleuth is Detective Inspector Gutkind.

The world of J is metaphorically shrouded in mist and fog, as if truth and wisdom have disappeared from a civilization overwhelmed by guilt and horror. It is a brusque, dumbed-down world filled with babble and confusion, in which nobody knows anything worth knowing and people compulsively apologize to each other. Like Winston Smith in 1984, Kevern and Ailinn's quest is to uncover the suppressed truth about the past, but, again like Winston – spoiler alert – they are defeated.



J
Howard Jacobson
Hamish Hamilton

Born in Manchester in 1942, Jacobson has been called England's answer to America's Philip Roth, and may even be a rough British equivalent of our own Mordecai Richler. He seems to be maintaining a tradition established by the late Victorian British writer Israel Zangwill of penning low satirical portraits of British Jews (see Zangwill's 1899 novel Children Of The Ghetto). Some of the Jewish characters in Jacobson's 2010 novel The Finkler Question, which won the Man Booker Prize, seem as self-effacing as the letter "J" in the current book under discussion.

When Jacobson writes of "What Happened, If It Happened," he gives us enough glimpses of the thing to let us know it is an event parallel to the Holocaust. And what might "J" be but the first letter of the word "Jews," another of the author's obsessions? (Tellingly, the author's name begins with the same letter.)

This near-future post-apocalyptic tale marks a distinct departure for Jacobson, in which the dark comedy is overpowered by paranoia and prognostications of doom. But if this hybrid murder mystery and dystopian fantasy is an experiment, it fails. The characters seem cardboard and there is a dearth of concrete description to anchor the reader in the dull pea-soup of fog and churning oceans of trivial detail.

Contrast this, say, with Cormac McCarthy's compellingly readable post-apocalyptic fantasy The Road (2006). McCarthy, a master craftsman, knows at all times where his characters are going and what is going to happen to them; their quest for survival is basic and well defined. The arc of the story is small, especially as compared to the vastness of what we don't know (and never find out) about the calamity that has almost destroyed human civilization. Although they are swathed in grey smog, the nameless father and son in The Road are realized with such clean lines and clarity of human emotion that they seem to transcend into myth.

Nothing of the sort happens in J. One wishes that Jacobson would draw more from human nature and real life (like his American counterpart Philip Roth) and less from the vast reserves of punchy stories and situations that have apparently accumulated in the "old curiosity shop" of his cluttered brain. ■

High school portrait exhibit draws top honours

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

An innovative high school art project, which gave students the opportunity to exhibit their work in a prestigious show last spring at the Ottawa City Archives' James Bartleman Gallery, was honoured at an awards ceremony this month.

Following the Ottawa Face 2 Face art exhibit in April 2014, the project was nominated for – and subsequently won – an award from the Advisory Committee on the Arts. The awards ceremony was held Jan. 12.

Irv Osterer, head of the fine arts and technology department at Merivale High School, is also the co-ordinator of the Communication & Design FOCUS Program, which enables students to spend an entire semester in the art department and gives them a head start toward a career in graphic arts.

He used the opportunity to lead his students in the creation of a series of 50 portraits of people who had spent a significant part of their lives in the nation's capital. The only design regulation was that the work must have an Ottawa theme; other than that, the students were free to use their imaginations in terms of subject, style and medium.

Osterer began by doing some Internet research to compile an initial list of about 100 possible subjects, from which the students chose 50.

"I tried to cover all bases and chose a diverse list of people," he said.

Among the various hats he wears, Osterer is the longtime head of the Jewish Culture Club at Merivale and was delighted to see a number of Jewish students involved in the project, as well as several Jewish subjects being chosen for the portraits.

"It was really cool because he really looked like the picture," Izzy said. "He really liked it."

Rabbi Bulka also liked the artist, and said, "More important than her artistry is her persona – truly unassuming and full of life."

• Ottawan Dan Kanter is perhaps best known for being Justin Bieber's guitarist and musical director for the 2010-11 My World Tour. The son of Julie Kanter and longtime Nepean High School drama teacher Jeff Kanter, was painted by Andi Bordt, a fan who follows the Kanter Twitter feed. "He tweeted a photo of his effort to Kanter, who replied with words of appreciation and encouragement," Osterer said.

• Noah Cantor, likely the most successful football player to come from Ottawa, was drawn by Shogo Shimizu. Cantor, who won four Grey Cups in a 12-year career and was a CFL All Star in 2000, is well known in his home town of Ottawa.

• Roxanne Nash, who has performed in a number of musicals, including the National Arts Centre Cappies Gala, is a big fan of the band Arcade Fire and painted a portrait of drummer Jeremy Gara. ■

Azrieli Foundation offers $100K for new Jewish music

CJN STAFF

Two new prizes of $50,000 each are being offered by the Azrieli Foundation to the composers of any faith or background of original orchestral Jewish music judged by a jury to be named.

The Azrieli Music Project (AMP) has been established to "celebrate, foster and create opportunities for the performance of high quality new orchestral music on a Jewish theme or subject," says its chair, soprano and Jewish music scholar Sharon Azrieli Perez.

The prizes are to be awarded in two categories.

The Azrieli Prize in Jewish Music is an international prize for a recently composed (within the last 10 years) or performed work of at least 15 minutes duration by a living composer, but never commercially recorded. It is open to composers of any nationality, age or experience. The deadline for submissions is Jan. 1, 2016.

The prize of the Azrieli Commissioning Competition is a grant for the creation of a work of orchestral Jewish music between 15 and 25 minutes in length. This prize is limited to Canadian citizens or permanent residents of any age or experience.

Sharon Azrieli Perez

A written proposal of the work to be composed, plus two excerpts of three minutes each from previously completed works (score and recording), must be submitted by March 15, 2015. The deadline for the completed composition is July 1, 2016.

The Orchestre symphonique de Montréal (OSM) under the direction of Kent Nagano will perform the winning works at the Azrieli Music Project Gala Concert at the Maison symphonique on Oct. 19, 2016.

"Music has always played an important role in the development of cultural identities," said Azrieli Perez. "Whether through folk traditions, in liturgical settings or in the concert hall, music reflects history and soul. In creating this extraordinary opportunity for composers of Jewish orchestral music, we hope to sustain music's vital continuity through the long and rich history of Jewish people and culture.

"The AMP will become the medium for innovation, creation and risk-taking by today's most inspired orchestral composers."

What constitutes 'Jewish music' is, of course, open to interpretation and she recognizes that its definition is continually evolving.

Taking into account the rich and diverse history of Jewish musical traditions, the AMP defines Jewish music as music that incorporates a Jewish thematic or Jewish musical influence.

Jewish themes may include biblical, historical, liturgical, secular or folk elements. The AMP believes Jewish music should also be forward-looking, and encourages themes and content drawn from contemporary Jewish life.

Opera singer Joseph Rouleau, honorary president of Jeunesses Musicales Canada, will serve as chair of the AMP advisory council. "It is a tremendous pleasure to help launch this significant new prize, which offers such extraordinary opportunities for the two composers who will have their work performed by Maestro Nagano and the OSM, and for the public who will benefit from the creation of two new works of art on the fascinating theme of Jewish music."

Rouleau is joined on the advisory council by soprano Azrieli Perez, a director on the Azrieli Foundation board; Canadian composer Ana Sokolovi , former citizenship court judge and arts patron Barbara Seal, and classical music philanthropist David Sela.

The AMP jury will be announced at a later date. ■

SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

End-of-life care discussion should be a given

Dr. Michael Gordon

As a physician living and practising in Canada for almost 40 years, and having completed medical school in Scotland, and having worked in a number of countries with universal health-care systems, I found a New York Times commentary on the sad state of contemporary American medicine ironic.

The Aug. 30, 2014 article, "Coverage for End-of-Life Talks Gaining Ground," started with the following: "Five years after it exploded into a political conflagration over 'death panels,' the issue of paying doctors to talk to patients about end-of-life care is making a comeback, and such sessions may be covered for the 50 million Americans on Medicare as early as next year."

Those of us who follow the American political scene may recall the absurd contention by Sarah Palin, the vice-presidential Republican nominee, that the "government" was planning "death panels" that would decide which Americans, including elders, would be allowed to get medical care or forgo it for budgetary reasons. Her contention had no truth, but it sidelined the question of funding from federal Medicare payments to physicians to support end-of-life and advance care planning conversations.

Here we are now in 2015. Very slowly and incrementally, the American public, physicians, and bureaucrats in the public and private sectors are beginning to develop funding mechanisms for what is now recognized as a very important, humane and respectful process for discussions that are helpful to individuals and their families in dealing with something that will ultimately affect all people: their end-of-life wishes.

In most jurisdictions where the negative stigma of end-of-life planning has been overcome and what is often called "advance-care-planning" exists and is supported, there is ample evidence that it serves patients, their families and physician and allied health-care professionals well.

I have not practised in the United States for many decades, but I have had to deal with American family members going through end-of-life situations, and I was taken aback by the focus on invasive and technologically prioritized treatments in contrast to palliative care philosophy-based decisional options where clearly the medically effective treatments are likely to be futile.

This is a sharp contrast from my experience in Ontario where I currently work and have had those conversations for many years in both the geriatric medicine and the palliative care domains. The active discussions about advance care planning and end-of-life preferences and options are supported by billing codes for such communications with patients and families.

The most important message is that these conversations are crucial, and I see this played out when patients are admitted to the palliative care unit, where most of them, although not all, understand what the stakes are, and are prepared to make the best decisions, along with the dedication of the health-care professional staff, to focus on symptom management and psycho-social issues, rather than being mesmerized by elusive technological treatments during this last period of life.

In contrast to the current situation in the United States, which it seems might be ready for a dramatic change, I and other physicians are reimbursed for the time and effort that goes into these end-of-life and advance care planning discussions.

This should be the standard of practice in this century – as it must be unless you believe in immortality. Modern medicine has many "tricks" up its ever-expanding technological sleeve, but as physicians, we must help our patients and their families know when it is time to say "enough," and prepare them for the time when not even the best of medicine can change the trajectory of the end-of-life process. That end should be as dignified as possible and supported medically with proper symptomatic care. ■

Yacov Fruchter says partnering with God can make even the most bitter situation sweet
Rabbi Shalom Spira remembers a rabbi who worked in the birthplace of rock and roll
Rachael Turkienicz explains that there is a time for prayer, and a time for action

Yacov Fruchter

After all the miracles of the Exodus from Egypt, culminating with the splitting of the Red Sea, we would expect B'nei Yisrael to be in an elevated spiritual state of gratitude. Instead, it takes but three days without finding water for everything to fall apart.

Desperate for water, they arrive at a place called Marata. Their excitement quickly turns to dismay as the water they find there is too bitter (mar, in Hebrew) to drink: thus the appropriate name of the location.

The Baal Shem Tov has a surprising commentary on Shmot 15:23: "And they could not drink water from Mara because they were bitter." He explains that the "they" in this sentence is actually referring to the Children of Israel, not the water itself. They could not drink the water because they were too bitter to appreciate it. He adds that when people are bitter, they see only the negative and can't appreciate the good.

We all know this to be true about human nature. When someone is bitter, it is very easy to "poison the well." But shouldn't we expect better from this group of former slaves who just experienced miracles?

In reality, these former slaves were in a fragile state of transition. Having been freed from the shackles of servitude, they were also stripped of the constancy they relied on. Habits, even if they are imposed through force, offer comfort. The bitterness was simply a growing pain related to their newfound freedom.

They expected the opposite of slavery to be abundance of physical pleasure without the requirement to work for it in any way. Yet, instead, they found themselves searching desperately for water, the most basic sustaining nutrient. Rather than simply giving them water, God invites them to become a partner and shows them how to cure the water of its bitterness. God was teaching us that in partnership, we can make the most bitter of situations sweet. ■

Yacov Fruchter is spiritual leader of Toronto's Annex Shul.

Rabbi Shalom Spira

Last week marked the yahrtzeit of Rabbi Efraim Greenblatt, head of the beit din in Memphis, Tenn. Shulchan Aruch Yoreh De'ah 394:2 rules that we do not eulogize after 12 months. Still, our parshah, Beshalach, offers the opportunity to express appreciation.

We read: "And Moses took the bones of Joseph with him" (Exodus 13:19). The Gemarah explains that the ark of Joseph voyaged alongside the Ark of the Law. When asked why, the Jews would answer, "This one fulfilled what is written in that one."

Indeed, Rabbi Greenblatt strove to fulfil what is written in the Torah, including himself writing the responsa Teshuvot Rivevot Efraim, named after the blessing that Moses gives Joseph in Deut. 33:17. Interestingly, one of the responsa appears to take the equation between the two arks quite literally.

Rivevot Efraim (7:235) allows only men to carry a sefer Torah, similar to the custom that governs pallbearers as derived from the Gemarah, Sanhedrin 20a. (On the other hand, rabbis Aryeh and Dov Frimer, in Tradition 32:2, report that Rabbi Moshe Feinstein would, under some circumstances, authorize women to carry a sefer Torah.)

In the introduction, Aruch haShulchan, a major decisor of Halachah, finds a further message in Exodus 13:19. It alludes to the multicultural enterprise where "Moses took the essence of Joseph with him" in order to publish the Shulchan Aruch. This insight, as well, reflects the life of Rabbi Greenblatt, who worked with Rabbi Yuval Noff to publish Rivevot v'Yovlot.

"Then Moses will sing" (Exodus 15:1). The Gemarah, Sanhedrin 91b, elucidates this as a reference to the future resurrection. May Rabbi Greenblatt, who spiritually enriched the "birthplace of rock and roll," participate in that ultimate musical performance. ■

This week's Torah portion, Beshalach, is filled with moments of danger, redemption, salvation, nurturing and trust. Israel leaves Egypt, but the Egyptians pursue and corner them with the Red Sea behind them and the Egyptian army in front.

The nation turns to Moses with the ancient voice of Jewish sarcasm: "There weren't enough graves in Egypt that you needed to bring us into the desert to die? I told you this would happen!"

In response to Israel's allegations, Moses turns and cries out to God. The text doesn't tell us what Moses' prayer is, but it does tell us of God's surprising response.

God replies to Moses by asking, "Why are you yelling at me? Speak to the Children of Israel and get them to move!"

Our surprise is that the very first lesson Israel learns about survival is that you must participate actively and not wait for God to save the day. For the ancient Israelites, the plagues in Egypt demonstrated that God would fight their battles. Their moment of action comes just before the 10th plague, when they must paint their doorposts with the blood of the sacrifice. They are beginning to learn that they must participate in their own destiny.

When all seems lost, one would think the correct spiritual gesture would be to turn to God. Yet, at this crucial moment, the all-important message is that there is never a moment when all seems lost. We must always be active in our own destiny and our own security. God is teaching Moses that there is a time for prayer and a time for action. We participate with God in our destinies and do not passively await what might occur. ■

'I felt trapped in my own home'

Lisa Rubin*

Growing up, I spent my summers at my parents' cottage on Lake Simcoe. I have fond memories of this, since it was the summer vacation and I spent my time with my best friend who lived three cottages down from me.

I liked to swim, and one day while at the beach, I met my now ex-boyfriend. I was in the water and he swam up to me and began a conversation. I was only 15 and he was 14. Although we had just met, I immediately had a feeling that this person was not right for me. I was totally disinterested in getting to know him, and although I was polite, I quickly made up an excuse as to why I had to leave.

My parents' cottage was a block away from the beach, and I went home. At the time, I was totally unaware that this boy was following me. Later in the day, I decided to go to my friend's cottage, and when I stepped out, I saw him standing there waiting for me. I was flattered but felt a little uneasy. After a few times of him coming around and waiting for me, I tried to discourage him by saying that I already had a boyfriend. This did not deter him though, and he kept coming around and pursuing me. At the beginning, he was very nice and we started hanging out together.

I saw him for several years in the summer, and during the school year, we corresponded by mail. Eventually, he moved to Toronto to be close to me. We started dating, and after awhile, he asked me to marry him.

I declined his proposal because there were many red flags. He was rarely honest with me and we had many verbal disagreements because of this. He was never able to save any money, he was very prejudiced and in trouble with the law for various reasons. Even so, I remained friends with him. It went on like this for many years, and twice more he asked me to marry him. Eventually, I gave in and we got engaged.

I was naive, and in order to save money for our marriage, I suggested that we open a joint bank account, which he promptly emptied. This led to our breaking up and we went our separate ways for a year and a half. We had no contact whatsoever, but all of a sudden, he contacted me the day before Valentine's Day. Right from the beginning, he lied to me, saying he was in another relationship and just wanted to see how I was doing. I later found out that this was not the case.

> Every time I asked him to leave, he told me he wouldn't go unless I forced him with the police

Now, for the second time, I caved in, and we again started seeing each other. I kind of felt it was easier to be with someone I already knew than to start over with someone else. Again we stayed together for many years, but this time, it was worse. Our arguments were more frequent, and now there was a physically abusive element to our relationship as well. I was very intimidated by him. At this point, we were living together in my house, and although I asked him to leave several times, he would not. Every time I asked him to leave, he told me he wouldn't go unless I forced him with the police. He refused to go peacefully.

I felt trapped in my own home, and eventually, through a counsellor, I got involved with a group for women in abusive relationships. This counsellor also referred me to an agency called Act to End Violence against Women, where I met some amazing people who helped me from start to finish to extricate myself from this abusive partner.

It's now almost a year since I left my ex-boyfriend, and although he lives down the street from me, it is by far the best decision I have ever made. I feel so much freer and in control of my life. In total, my relationship lasted almost 38 years, and although I thought I would never get out, thanks to the wonderful support of this agency, I now have a future. ■

Talking 'gives people permission to come forward'

She said that when the issue is talked about freely in the community, "it gives people permission to come forward."

Sasson said she would also like people to understand that her organization values the family unit and does not push women to leave their husbands.

"A woman doesn't come for help and is encouraged to divorce. The way we work is centred on the woman, centred on her story and centred on her reality. We do not impose our values, or our advice. We work with her to make her own decision, and she is free to stay in the relationship. We're here to offer her safety measures, safety planning, and help her make decisions for herself," Sasson said. In addition to its shelter – a 12-bed facility with full time staff – Auberge Shalom's counselling and resource office provides consultation and guidance to women, whether they're living with a partner or not.

"It could be for women who are contemplating leaving and eventually come to the shelter. It could be for a woman who chooses never to leave and she needs the counselling and support while she is living in this relationship, or it could be after," Sasson said. "We provide individual counselling, group counselling, we have a shelter, and we have a transitional housing support program for emergency housing for women who are leaving dangerous situations in their home."

In Toronto, Krowitz said that in addition to alternative short-term emergency housing for Jewish women and their children, which is operated by ATEVAW in partnership with JF&CS, her organization recently launched a legal information service for Jewish women who have experienced abuse.

"The purpose of the legal information service is to help women navigate the family law system, with everything from helping them get legal aid to appealing legal aid refusals... to helping them find the right lawyer," Krowitz said. "We have vetted many lawyers and talked to them about their knowledge of domestic abuse and violence against women. We help them get their documents ready for a lawyers appointment or for court... We help them take the emotion out of it."

In addition, she said ATEVAW does programming with youth and has visited the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto to talk to the older students about healthy relationships, and to university campuses to talk about sexual violence.

JF&CS also offers a number of programs to support women victimized by domestic abuse, as well as their children, such as Here to Help, a group program funded by Ontario's Ministry of Community and Social Services.

Shaw said JF&CS also runs programs with Orthodox day schools through its school social work program.

Social workers work with Jewish day schools and public schools with large Jewish populations to provide early detection and intervention in cases where children might be at risk. ■

To access these and for other resources and services, contact ATEVAW's main line at 905-695-5372; JF&CS at 416-638-7800; or Auberge Shalom's support line at 514-731-0833.

Marek Halter: Jews should stay in France

elevy@thecjn.ca

Noted intellectual French-Polish author Marek Halter believes that the appalling massacre perpetrated by two jihadists at the office of the satirical newspaper Charlie Hebdo and the hostage-taking in a kosher store in the Paris area, which ended with the killing of four innocent Jews, will finally make the French take note of the "huge menace" for France and other democracies that "the scourge of Islamist terrorism" represents.

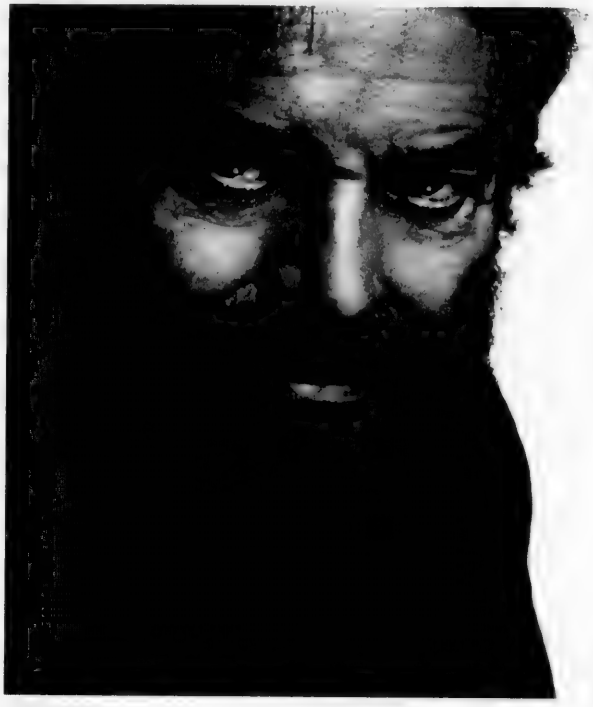
In an interview from Paris, Halter, an internationally known author whose books include the bestseller The Book of Abraham, is a tireless advocate for rapprochement and dialogue between Jews and Muslims. He spoke to The CJN about the aftermath of the two attacks.

The Jews of France have recently once again lived through some very dark days. What is their current state of mind?

Until now, when French Jews were killed or severely attacked by violently anti-Semitic jihadists, the French were upset for a day or so. The sinister anti-Jewish attacks were quickly forgotten. Since the murders at the Charlie Hebdo offices, the French seem to have finally become aware of a fact that has long escaped them: the Islamist terrorists also want to kill the values that made the French Republic what it is, first of all our freedom of expression.

Hasn't there been less importance attached to anti-Semitism in France in the last few years?

In France, when only Jews are attacked, no one is really happy, but, unfortunately, there are still many people who say, out loud, without the least embarrassment: "When a Jew is attacked, everyone is shocked, but when a black, an Arab or and Armenian is attacked... nobody talks about it." Or, "A Jewish life is considered more important than a Christian or Muslim life." Since the horrible murder of the Charlie Hebdo cartoonists, the French have finally realized that the Islamist jihadists have two great macabre intentions: to kill the greatest number of Jews possible and to attack the basic values of the French Republic, especially freedom of expression. Goethe, the great German poet, said that "the Jews are the thermometer by which you can measure the degree of humanity in humanity." Our pollsters today who ask about prejudice and racism forget to take into account that illustrious German thinker. History has proved that those who attack the Jews subsequently attack other minorities: Arabs, blacks, Gypsies.



Marek Halter

You recently published a letter in the French daily Le Monde addressed to the Jews of France. In it, you urged the Jews not to leave their native country out of the fear because of the new outbreak of anti-Semitism and the upsurge of jihadism in France. The letter had a huge impact on the Jewish community of France and led to a lively debate.

This year again, aliyah to Israel from France will reach a record high. In my letter in Le Monde, I told my Jewish French brothers and sisters that I perfectly understand those who want to move to Israel for religious reasons. In my opinion, that's a logical and very legitimate reason. On the other hand, I also told them that Jews should not leave France simply because they are afraid. France also belongs to the Jews. Fleeing from France is not a solution. Anti-Semitism, like all forms of racism, is a universal illness, an epidemic that kills all over the world.

> One thing is certain: we are not in a war between civilizations, but right in the middle of a war between religions.

Moreover, is it so easy to leave a home that you have spent so much time building? Jews have lived in France for more than 2,000 years – since the Roman period. Jews were subjects of the kings of France when the Normans were not yet French. Jews have been in France for almost 16 centuries. On the façade of the most prestigious cathedral in France, and maybe even in the world, Notre-Dame de Paris, are 28 statues depicting the 28 kings of Israel.

But we have to recognize that many Jews no longer feel at home in France.

Why do you want the Jews to leave France, to give in to those who hate us and specifically want to see us leave our country permanently? Can the Jews leave this home – our home – to the jihadists and the National Front? One day, I asked the chief rabbi of Frankfurt, Nathan Levinson, who is of German origin and returned from exile, in an American uniform, after the war, why he stayed in Germany. His answer was straightforward: "To deprive Hitler of his ultimate victory – a Judenrein Germany [one that is free of Jews]."

Are you afraid the Islamist terrorist attacks that recently harmed France will lead to an increase in Islamophobia in French society?

Unfortunately, yes. It is imperative that France begin to show appreciation for its Muslims, the majority of whom are also strongly opposed to Islamic fundamentalism. In France, until now, they didn't understand the stakes involved in this very important issue, because the French Republic has never officially or legally recognized the communities that live in the country.

In France, the many communities that live together have different cultures and traditions, something the French leaders have not yet understood. Sooner or later, they will need to admit this striking reality.

Do you think France and the West will be able to win the harsh war they are fighting against the Islamist fundamentalists today?

One thing is certain: we are not in a war between civilizations, but right in the middle of a war between religions. Until now, we have ignored the prophecy of author André Malraux: "The 21st century will be religious or it won't be at all." I am absolutely convinced that the democratic western world will win the battle against obscurantism and religious fanaticism, hideously epitomized today by the Islamist terrorists. If I believed that we were going to lose this crucial battle, I would not be out there fighting it with all my force. Sunday, Jan. 11, more than four million French people came out into the street to fight the major battle where the stakes are so gigantic: the future of our democratic values and our "holy" freedom of expression. ■

Significance of Holocaust memorial dates

Backstory

CARL S. EHRLICH

Jan. 27 is a significant date for music lovers, for on this day in 1756, one of the greatest creative geniuses of all time, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, was born in Salzburg, Austria.

But, this date is also significant from a Jewish perspective. On Jan. 27, 1945, the Soviet army liberated the Nazi death-camp at Auschwitz, where so many Jews and other innocents had been brutalized and brutally murdered.

While a significant date for Jews worldwide and the subject of commemorative activities, Jan. 27 is but one of a number of dates that have been proposed for Jewish commemorations of the Holocaust.

For Jewish refugees from Germany, Jan. 27 is not the usual day chosen to commemorate the Holocaust, but Nov. 9. On that day in 1938, the Nazis unleashed a two-day orgy of death and destruction against the Jews and their communal institutions in the German Reich, ostensibly in response to the assassination of a low-level German diplomat in Paris by a young Jewish man from Poland who was upset about his parents' deportation. While politically correct German Jews in the modern world refer to this event as the November Pogrom, the name that has taken hold is Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass, alluding to the contemporaneous observation that the shattered glass from Jewish homes, businesses and synagogues glittered like crystal.

Once again, however, this date, while significant in Jewish history and consciousness, has not become the official day on which the worldwide Jewish community commemorates the Holocaust. The most commonly accepted date to commemorate the Holocaust for Jews globally has become the modern State of Israel's choice of date, the 27th day of the Jewish month of Nisan, which falls in April or May.

This date was chosen because in 1943, it fell in the middle of the fabled Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, when a few hundred poorly armed Jews decided to take their fate into their own hands and rose up in a doomed revolt against the Nazis' plans to liquidate the ghetto. As of the 10th anniversary of the uprising, this solemn holiday, named Yom Hashoah, has been observed in Israel and has slowly but inexorably become the most widely recognized Jewish commemoration of the Holocaust (the only holdouts being haredim who cannot countenance the addition of a modern holiday to the Jewish liturgical calendar, and those who continue to observe various local traditions).

The different dates for these commemorations of the Holocaust are not arbitrary decisions reached by diverse communities, but reveal much about the people and organizations choosing each date. The United Nations' choice of the date of the liberation of Auschwitz on Jan. 27 expresses a certain level of empathy for the Jews as the passive victims of a brutal regime that no longer exists. The UN is markedly less comfortable with the contemporary Jewish state, which refuses to "go gentle into that good night."

German Jews' choice of Kristallnacht to commemorate the Holocaust echoes their specific experience and marks an important and tragic step on the way to the "final solution," but the November Pogrom affected what was ultimately a relatively small minority of the Jews victimized by the Holocaust.

Finally, Israel's decision to tie in the commemoration of the Holocaust with the event of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising is also ideologically motivated. In Hebrew, the holiday is termed Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah, Holocaust and Heroism Day. Rejecting the image of the Jew as the passive victim of brutality, the modern State of Israel has deliberately chosen to commemorate the Holocaust by remembering the heroism of those who fought against their impending doom. In this manner, Yom Hashoah became paradigmatic for the fate of the young State of Israel, surrounded by enemies and fighting for its survival.

In emphasizing the heroism of Jews during the Holocaust, Yom Hashoah turns the traditional image of the Jews as passive victims on its head and provides both Israel and Jews throughout the world with active role models to emulate. ■

It's never too late to be who you are, and a QB's mystery menorah

Actor comes out at 82

Actor Joel Grey, 82, who won an Oscar and a Tony Award for playing the MC in Cabaret, came out as gay Jan. 28 in a People magazine interview. "I don't like labels, but if you have to put a label on it, I'm a gay man," he said. Grey, who was married to actress Jo Wilder for 24 years and is the father of actress Jennifer Grey, was already out to friends and family, but hadn't spoken publicly about his sexuality. His original surname was Katz, and his father, Mickey Katz, was also an actor. He told People that growing up in Cleveland, he was attracted to both sexes, but heard "the grownups... in the next room, my mother included, talking derisively about 'fairies.'"

Joel Grey in Cabaret

A very Brady Chanukah?

In the lead-up to Sunday's Super Bowl, it was revealed that New England Patriots star quarterback Tom Brady has a menorah displayed in his home. In a Jan. 26 New York Times profile, a reporter said he noticed the chanukiyah in Brady's house: "We're not Jewish," Brady said when asked about it. "But I think we're into everything... I don't know what I believe. I think there's a belief system. I'm just not sure what it is." Brady was raised Catholic, and his supermodel wife Gisele Bundchen, is a non-Jewish Brazilian, but perhaps the Jewishness of his brother-in-law, ex-Boston Red Sox star Kevin Youkilis or Patriots owner Robert Kraft have rubbed off on the superstar pivot.

Freundel (still) in the house

The Washington, D.C., synagogue that fired Rabbi Barry Freundel after he was charged with voyeurism is trying to evict him from his shul-owned residence. On Jan. 28, Kesher Israel launched a case with the Beit Din of America to oust the rabbi, who was arrested last fall on charges he spied on women, among them his students and converts, who used a mikvah next to the Orthodox synagogue. The shul is contractually obligated to take disputes with Rabbi Freundel to the beit din, which it did after informal talks broke down. Rabbi Freundel is reportedly granting his wife, Sharon, a religious divorce, or get. ■

Dealing with Iran

As we remember the horrors of Auschwitz and the Shoah, one lesson stands out in dealing with today's threats from Iran: if someone threatens to wipe you out, you need to believe that they mean it.

Hitler's plan outlined in Mein Kampf, was published in 1922 and translated into many languages. World leaders ignored his threats through 1933 (when he was first elected, following the collapse of the Weimar Republic) and Neville Chamberlain's infamous appeasement at Munich in 1938. It took Winston Churchill to wake the world up and deal with Hitler decisively.

Today, Iranian leaders routinely threaten to wipe Israel and the Jews "off the map." In attempting to keep Iran from manufacturing nuclear weapons, world leaders need to be tough with Iran. Sadly, there are no Churchills in Europe, the White House or anywhere in the world today — only Chamberlains.

Domestic abuse and men

I was disappointed to read the one-sided view of women being portrayed as victims and men as abusers when the understanding has advanced far past that social myth ("Domestic abuse is a Jewish issue, too," Jan. 22). Men are equally likely to be battered and abused in the same and similar ways to women. Yet not a single sentence was devoted to advancing any real discussion, let alone solution, to the overall problem of domestic violence, which doesn't discriminate on social, religious, financial, geographic or gender grounds.

Thousands of men and their children suffer the pain of being abused by spouses or intimate partners. A general climate once existed for ignoring the sorry plight these men find themselves in. However, that has dramatically changed, and all shelters and women's programs now at least acknowledge male victimhood and that there are large numbers of male victims, even if these agencies are unequipped or prepared to offer solutions or simply shelter. The fact that men and their children find no systemic safe haven is further cause to make their suffering better understood, not a reason to hide them.

Welcoming the intermarried

I am writing to express my dismay and disappointment at views expressed by some of our rabbis and spiritual leaders in the press, and from the bimah in the recent months, regarding interdating and intermarriage.

I am the trained keruv consultant for the Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs in Ontario, and have served in this capacity since 2000. The Keruv program was proposed to recognize the issue of intermarriage and provide a "path forward" for those affected by it. I set up a monthly support group for families and friends struggling with their issues, facilitated by a qualified social scientist, and this effort was supported by many rabbis in Toronto.

Our kids meet others at school or at work, find common interests, and ultimately get together.

Now, let's understand: the Jewish kid is not abandoning his or her Judaism. In fact, they frequently would like their partner to join the "tribe." If we push them away and ostracize them from our families, friends and communities, and worse, our houses of prayer, how likely is that to happen? It is distressing to hear of rabbis and/or synagogues denying memberships to even the Jewish partner in interfaith unions, as a consequence to the Jew "marrying out." Is it any wonder that 70 per cent of the children of interfaith couples no longer remain Jewish. How and why can they stay Jewish if we bar them from our schools, synagogues and society?

We must learn to accommodate our kids' choices, not to encourage intermarriage, but to support the inevitable decisions our kids make and encourage them to remain faithful to the faith of our parents.

And what should we do about our Jewish widows and widowers, who in their loneliness decide to acquire a new partner who is not Jewish? Do we now bar our doors to them and reject their new partners?

Our kids are not trying to test us when they interdate or intermarry. They are just trying to be happy. Let us not make that decision a curse for us all.

Rambam Health Care Campus
Prepared for all Imminent Scenarios

According to the latest news, Iran and Hezbollah are planning an imminent joint invasion of Israel's northern Galilee region. This reality has forced Rambam Hospital, to make equipping the Sammy Ofer Fortified Underground Emergency Hospital an urgent priority.

The largest structure of its kind in the world, sets a new standard for safe care in times of extreme emergency. This visionary structure converts from a 1,500-vehicle parking lot into a 2,000-bed emergency hospital fortified against conventional and non-conventional weapons.

As Rambam serves over two million residents in the north of Israel, we must be prepared to safely provide the highest level of medical care, especially in these times the need is more urgent than ever.

We cannot do it without your help.
Your gift will help fund one of the most advanced initiatives of its kind in the world and serve as a lasting reminder of your solidarity with Israel at the time of their greatest need.

RABBI-2-RABBI

The power of the sermon

In the era of social media, there may be more effective ways of communicating important messages, but there's no substitute for one-on-one interaction with congregants.

RABBI ARI ISENBERG
SHAAR SHALOM CONGREGATION, HALIFAX

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Ari Isenberg: Last week, a congregant asked if I remember the sermons delivered by my childhood rabbi. "A terrific question," I remarked, and paused to reflect.

The rabbi of my youth was the late Rabbi A. Bernard Leffell of Shaare Zedek Congregation in Montreal. Though I was still young when he retired, I remember that he would always deliver his sermons from the lectern with conviction and eloquence. His messages were expository in nature – he would identify a complicated issue or text, analyze and explore it from several points of view, and then guide the congregation to its resolution.

But once every few weeks, Rabbi Leffell descended from the pulpit and facilitated an informal Q&A with the congregation. These are the instances that I recall with vivid excitement. To watch him navigate the aisles was thrilling. Like an orchestra conductor, he wove a selection of voices and opinions into one congruent tapestry.

What do you recall about the rabbis of your youth?

Rabbi Scheier: I don't think I have one strong model for sermons that inspires me in my preaching, but one impression I inevitably had as a child was that the sermons were generally quite long. On my first Shabbat at Shaar Hashomayim, just moments before my first-ever sermon to the congregation, a synagogue member handed me a small piece of paper. It said, "A good sermon is a short sermon."

One principle I try to incorporate into my teaching is that it must be interesting – not only on a Torah level, but also on a human level. I keep in mind the quote attributed to Rabbi Joseph Lookstein, who taught homiletics at Yeshiva University for many years: "If you haven't struck oil within the first 20 minutes, stop boring."

There is a larger question, though. A few weeks ago, I noticed that a post I wrote on Facebook had been shared and viewed many, many times. The number of people who saw this particular post rivaled the number of people who hear my sermons on a regular basis. In the era of social media, is the sermon still the most effective way of communicating important messages to our congregants?

Rabbi Ari Isenberg: A similar thing happened to me last year leading up to Yom Hazikaron, Israel's Remembrance Day, when I posted a message on Facebook reminding people of the day's significance and the ritual of lighting a yahrzeit candle in commemoration. I was awed by the response. Beyond those who viewed and shared my post, I noted that many people heeded the message, lighting yahrzeit candles of their own. Without Facebook, might they have missed the day altogether?

The most effective teacher is one who can convey a message in different styles and formats. If we utilize all that the social medial world has to offer, not only will our rabbinic voices reach wider audiences, we'll reach more diverse audiences as well. But as we do more of our communication and teaching online, is there a risk of us becoming more impersonal and less accessible? Are there situations where an in-person rabbinic presence is critical?

Rabbi Scheier: The journalist Jeffrey Goldberg once critiqued Newsweek's list of 50 Most Influential Rabbis by observing that it seemed to "slight congregational rabbis (the ones who interact with, you know, Jews)." I believe that this is essentially correct. The greatest rabbis are the ones we might never hear about, because they aren't publishing or posting or self-promoting in a very public way. Instead, they are the hospital chaplains, the bar and bat mitzvah teachers, the Jewish school teachers. Unfortunately, we have a tendency to interpret "influential" as "well-known," which isn't always a measure of quality.

If we aspire to change lives for the better – to inspire the members of our community – then there is no substitute for the one-on-one "I care about you, and I'm listening to you" personal contact. Yes, sermons have their power and impact, and social media posts have their use, but I recall a teaching I heard many times in rabbinical school: "If the rabbi made the hospital visit, then even the worst sermon will be received as a great sermon. But if s/he was absent, then even the most brilliant sermon will fail to inspire." ■

Speaking out against domestic abuse

This edition of The CJN marks the conclusion of reporter Sheri Shefa's three-part series on domestic abuse in the Canadian Jewish community. It has been an eye-opening experience, and many readers have been shocked to learn that one in four Jewish women experience domestic abuse in their lifetime, on par with the rate of occurrence across the country and beyond our community.

But that statistic comes as little surprise to those fighting against abuse in the Jewish community. "For most people in our community, they don't believe [domestic abuse] happens to us," says Penny Krowitz, executive director of Act To End Violence Against Women (ATEVAW). "They believe the Jewish community is immune to such things."

The question is: what can we do to combat domestic abuse in our midst?

The first step is education and awareness. In order to recognize abuse, we have to know what it looks like, in all its manifestations – verbal, physical, and emotional. On that front, there is room for cautious optimism: according to Diane Sasson, the veteran executive director of Auberge Shalom Pour Femmes, Montreal's kosher women's shelter, "Even in the more Orthodox world [which tends to be more traditional and insular], there is more of an understanding that there are many forms of abuse."

The next step, experts agree, is for community leaders to speak out against domestic abuse. In particular, religious authorities have the power to lead on the issue. "We would encourage… rabbis to do a sermon about [domestic abuse]," Krowitz says, "because the minute the rabbi does a sermon about it, he gives credibility to the issue." Sasson agrees: "We have the tools to work with, Jewishly, and I think our leaders and our rabbis need to speak about it, need to know it exists, need to talk about it, need to make internal policies in the synagogues." Krowitz and Sasson both hope more religious leaders will take up their challenge.

Perhaps most of all, though, we need to be willing to confront difficult issues like domestic abuse, instead of pretending they don't exist. "I think we have to talk about it and break down the shame and recognize that things happen in relationships," Krowitz says. When we address the issue, Sasson adds, "it gives people permission to come forward." But when we don't, we may perpetuate the shame that keeps women from admitting there is a problem. That's why silence is not an option.

Without a doubt, domestic abuse is a difficult subject to discuss – but that's all the more reason to be open about it. And that's why we felt it important to print alongside Shefa's series three personal essays from women who have experienced abuse first-hand. These brave women, all of whom have written pseudonymously, told their harrowing stories of abuse so that the rest of us might better recognize it ourselves.

Their stories underline what experts like Krowitz and Sasson are trying to tell us – that the Jewish community is not immune to domestic abuse, that abuse comes in many different forms, that help is available for those who need it. And finally, that we all have the power to do something about it. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

The last Nazi standing

Bernie M. Farber and Eric Vernon

And then there was one.

Seventy years after the end of World War II, Helmut Oberlander bears the dubious distinction of being the last of Canada's all-too-few cases from that era to be resolved. He is the last Nazi standing.

It was 30 years ago that then-prime minister Brian Mulroney established the Deschênes Commission to investigate the presence in Canada of perpetrators of Nazi war crimes and their collaborators. While no punishment could ever be commensurate with the magnitude of their heinous crimes, Justice Jules Deschênes understood that such actions were necessary both as a matter of fundamental justice and to protect the integrity of Canadian citizenship.

Were he alive today, Deschênes would be profoundly disappointed by how little was accomplished on these cases. In particular, one mechanism that he put forward, denaturalization and deportation, has been a spectacular failure.

Jan. 27 marked 20 years since the federal government informed Oberlander that it intended to revoke his citizenship, because of his "false representations or fraud or by knowingly concealing material circumstances in that you failed to divulge to Canadian Immigration and Citizenship officials your membership in the German Sicherheitspolizei und SD and Einsatzkommando 10A (EK 10A) during the Second World War and your participation in the executions of civilians during that period of time".

Because the granting of citizenship is a civil act, its revocation is as well, and the burden on the Crown was not to prove that Oberlander had committed war crimes or crimes against humanity, but that he had lied upon entering Canada and obtained his citizenship fraudulently. They did so, but Oberlander, who cheated his way into Canada, has continued to enjoy with impunity the privilege of our citizenship for decades.

Failure to disclose his involvement as a translator with Einsatzkommando 10A, one of the most notorious of the Nazi mobile killing squads that cut a murderous swath through eastern Europe killing thousands of Jews and other innocent civilians, should have been sufficient to close the deal on his denaturalization and deportation. One Federal Court decision made the point unassailably clear: As a member of EK 10a Oberlander could not have been unaware of the function of the unit. "Its purposes," the Court said, "he served."

In fact, translators were critical cogs in the Einsatzgruppen machinery of murder. One can hear the echoes of their voices as they rounded up human targets with local informers and collaborators: ("How many Jews were in this village? Where would they be apt to hide?"); assisted with interrogations ("Where are the others? Do they have weapons?"); and ordered victims to places of execution while maintaining the German obsession over control and order ("Line up over there in front of that ditch. Remove your clothing. Be silent.")

After the war, surviving Einsatzgruppen killers acknowledged that auxiliary members of the units like Oberlander were critical to the lethal success of their efforts. They were, in essence, Hitler's elite enablers.

Last month, the Federal Court upheld the most recent attempt to denaturalize him but Oberlander has indicated that he will appeal that decision.

For decades after the war, successive Canadian governments were indifferent to the presence of Nazi war criminals and enablers in Canada and justified their inaction with the convenient fiction that no remedies existed to resolve these cases. Once cases were finally launched, a great deal of delay was court-driven.

Oberlander's supporters have variously claimed that he has not received sufficient due process or that his Charter-guaranteed legal protection was violated. In fact, the precise opposite is true and Jewish advocacy strove to make the case that due process had to be commensurate with the urgency of natural justice, especially since too many other accused Nazis had died in mid-course.

Instead, Canadian courts often thwarted justice on the Oberlander file and were complicit in the unconscionable delays that have made his case a never-ending story. Over the two-decade history of Oberlander's case, Canadian courts routinely permitted lengthy continuances; took years to deliver decisions under reserve; allowed layers of appeals at every level and accepted and reviewed ungrounded legal and constitutional applications. In one instance, the Court partly based its decision on an argument that Oberlander himself had not seen fit to raise in his own defence.

Meanwhile, Jewish organizations fought a rearguard action in the court of public opinion.

To counter claims that we were seeking vengeance, we pointed out that these cases involved the pursuit of justice against those involved in the most heinous crimes in human history for which there were no statutes of limitations. To those upset that he had never been charged with committing war crimes, we offered the counter view that such civil cases as Oberlander's served to protect the integrity of precious Canadian citizenship from fraud and misrepresentation. They also provided the moral authority and judicial precedents to help ensure that Canada not be seen as a haven for war criminals and genocidaires.

Helmut Oberlander in uniform
ONTARIO JEWISH ARCHIVES, BLANKENSTEIN FAMILY HERITAGE CENTRE #2013.8.2

To those calling for clemency or consideration for Oberlander's advanced years and model behaviour while in Canada we argued that neither the duration of an individual's residence in Canada nor the goodness of his conduct since landing should preclude denaturalization and deportation where warranted. Our mantra was that "longevity should not be rewarded" and we implored opponents of these cases not to blinker their focus on the aged and feeble men in the docket but to cast their minds back to when the accused were young and hale and acting as cogs in genocide.

Sadly, Oberlander will probably die in Canada. One day when the full story of Canada's poor record of dealing with Nazi war criminals and their enablers in our midst is written, there will be some heroes but mostly shame enough to go around. ■

Bernie M. Farber and Eric Vernon worked on the Helmut Oberlander case and other Nazi war crimes cases for over two decades along with their Canadian Jewish Congress colleague Len Rudner.

The messiness of history, told by a Maus

ANDREW HUNTER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

"Art Spiegelman's great contribution to the medium of comics was to prove that comics could be real art. Before him, it was a debatable notion. After Maus, it was an undeniable fact."
—Seth, Canadian Cartoonist

That Art Spiegelman's groundbreaking comic Maus changed comics and is now recognized as one of the absolutely essential artistic and literary accomplishments of the 20th century is undeniable. Widely known today as a pair of bestselling graphic novels, the narrative originally unfolded as a series of chapters published in the highly influential magazine RAW from 1980 through 1991. (Spiegelman had founded RAW with his spouse, François Mouly, who went on to become the arts editor of The New Yorker.)

Pantheon Books subsequently brought the serialized RAW instalments together into two companion volumes, Maus I: A Survivor's Tale: My Father Bleeds History (1986) and Maus II: A Survivor's Tale: And Here My Troubles Began (1992). Primarily the story of one Polish Jew's "survival" of the Holocaust, the work is built around a series of strained conversations between father (Vladek Spiegelman) and son (Art Spiegelman). It is a relationship that echoes the fundamental struggle in a wider culture to come to terms with one of the greatest tragedies in human history, a tragedy that did not just happen (like some recurrent natural disaster), but was a methodically planned act of extermination on a grand scale.

The great strength of Maus is that it directly engages with the messiness of history, that it makes it deeply personal and does not shy away from exposing even the unflattering characteristics of the victims (Vladek's racism for example). It is absolutely clear that history is mired in the failings of memory and personal perspective, deeply subjective and often flawed, and Spiegelman demands that the Holocaust be understood as trauma, a trauma that continues to cast a long shadow with deep impact far beyond 1945.

"My father bleeds history," Spiegelman stated as the subtitle for Maus I, and this statement stands as a visceral acknowledgment that the violence did not end with the Allied victory and the liberation of concentration camps in 1945, but lingered as a wound that would mark subsequent generations. To be a survivor was to not experience closure but to carry the wounds with you (and pass them on to the next generation), and for many, that lingering wound was fatal. For Spiegelman's mother, Anya, who committed suicide in 1968, the wound bled slowly and painfully.

The absolute beginning of Maus was actually a short comic Spiegelman produced in 1972 for a commissioned collection edited by cartoonist Justin Green called Funny Animals, for which Spiegelman (and other cartoonists) were asked to produce a three-page strip using animals as central characters. The anthropomorphized animal has been a staple of comics and cartoons (with deep roots in the history of art and satirical graphics). A particularly powerful example was Walt Kelly's Pogo (a political strip that had a profound influence on Doonesbury and Bloom County) and, of course, Charles Schultz's Snoopy. While the animal substitute allows for a certain distance, it is also an opportunity to heighten characteristics. It is a risky but potent narrative strategy.

Following an initial idea to deal with racism, Spiegelman developed an intense short story featuring Nazi cats and Jewish mice called Maus in response to Green's request. As he has often noted, his choice of mice was a response to the Nazi categorization of Jews as "vermin." In this early comic, the renderings of the characters feel very much of their time and evince the underground comic esthetic of the radical San Francisco counter-culture Spiegelman was immersed in, surrounded by such contemporaries as Robert Crumb and the circle of innovators around Harvey Kurtzman's MAD magazine.

When he returned to the Maus subject matter, a few years later and after he'd moved back to New York, and began interviewing his father, he reworked the look of the characters. What emerged was graphically stark, high contrast and bold, a clear nod to early modern graphics and image narratives of Lynd Ward, Frans Masereel and German Expressionism. As always, Spiegelman worked with deep admiration for earlier cartoonists, and he has cited Harold Gray's Little Orphan Annie as a key influence. In turn, Maus would have a profound impact on comics to follow. It would be hard to imagine Marjane Satrapi's Persepolis (2000), Joe Sacco's award-winning war correspondent reportage (such as Footnotes in Gaza, 2009) or Chester Brown's Louis Riel (2004), without Maus.

Made-in-Israel success stories at IDC

Gil Troy

This past semester, I taught in an Israeli university for the first time, teaching American history at the Interdisciplinary Center (IDC) in Herzliya, while on leave from McGill University. Best known for hosting an annual anti-terrorism conference, the IDC is the Start Up Nation's startup university. This 20-year-old initiative mixes a cutting-edge entrepreneurial spirit with a friendly, communal tone.

The campus characterizes this fusion. The renovated, low, barracks-style buildings in the middle, remnants of the anti-aircraft air force base it was, generate a nice kibbutz-y feeling. New, beautifully maintained buildings surround the older campus, putting modern Israel in conversation with traditional Israel.

This being an Israeli university, for the first time in my teaching career, I had a student whose wife gave birth during the semester. I had another student request a last-minute extension, because a terrorist attack on a Tel Aviv bus keep him busy where he works at the Kirya, the defence headquarters in Tel Aviv.

In a school with 1,700 foreigners from over 80 countries among the 6,500 students, my class sometimes felt like what my mother calls, a "regular United Nations." My small seminar had two French students, one Brit and one Turk, amid the expected mix of North Americans and Israelis. During our final class, the traditional debate about whether elites or the masses should shape foreign policy expanded into a debate about whether wisdom resides with the many or the few. Two Americans questioned the electorate's judgment. We were all moved when our Turkish student discussed democracy's fragility, and the importance of protecting it, given how easily it can be subverted.

The IDC is Israel's first privately funded, not-for-profit institution of higher learning. In the entrepreneurial spirit that courses through the place, significant fundraising has welcomed thousands to the school on scholarships. The Israel at Heart Ethiopian Scholarship Program is particularly impressive. In addition to subsidizing tuition, it coaches Ethiopian-Israelis from freshman year through the post-school job hunt. My friend from Montreal, Michal Cotler-Wunsh, who now works as the school's director of international external relations and is organizing a new IDC outreach initiative in Canada, notes, "Every year, we see kids go from immigrant homes with illiterate parents to jobs at Herzog, Fox, Neeman or other leading Israeli firms, in one generation. It's amazing."

As we celebrate the 30th anniversary of Operation Moses, the start of this unique non-racist moment in western history when a majority white population willingly, voluntarily, happily brought in tens of thousands of willing black African immigrants, these are the kinds of made-in-Israel success stories IDC represents and the media overlooks. Moreover, the freedom-oriented democratic values the IDC and Israel represent explain the special, growing bond linking Israel with Canada.

On his recent Middle East visit, Foreign Minister John Baird was greeted in Ramallah with a not-so spontaneous demonstration pelting him – and implicitly all Canadians – with shoes and eggs, reflecting Palestinian contempt. The demonstrators – and by extension the Palestinian Authority – were dissing Baird, Prime Minister Stephen Harper, the Canadian people and the democratic values that unite Israel and Canada.

By contrast, Israelis welcomed Baird warmly. Fulfilling the IDC's old-new vision, Baird's itinerary included high-tech centres and Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market, known as "the shuk," for a good, old-fashioned falafel.

Just as we should be sure to make the IDC headline about the birth of a new generation of students, not the terrorists who disrupted my student's routine; just as we should make the Israel headline about daily life at the IDC, the shuk and the high-tech world, not the rare violent disruptions; we should make the headline about the Baird visit, the love he felt in Israel, not the hatred he experienced in Ramallah. ■

After Auschwitz

Sara Horowitz

Last week marked 70 years since the liberation of Auschwitz. In Canada, Israel, Europe and the United States, ceremonies marked the end of the torment and murder there. Survivors shared their recollections of that notorious place, and the impact of the traumatic loss of family and community on their subsequent lives.

Because seven decades have passed, living survivors of Auschwitz are overwhelmingly those who were children or adolescents during the war. Many found themselves impossibly bereft, negotiating their freedom without the guidance of parents, support of family, and familiarity of mother tongues and motherlands. The political philosopher Theodor Adorno famously wondered whether "after Auschwitz," can you go on living. Most survivors of Auschwitz and other camps and deportations, did, indeed, go on living, building richly rewarding lives, establishing families and laying new roots.

By "after Auschwitz," a phrase that became popular in postwar thinking about the Shoah, Adorno and others meant not only the nefarious labour and death camp complex near the town of Oswiecim in southern Poland, but the Holocaust in its entirety. And in marking the liberation of that camp and making space to listen to its survivors, we are, by extension, remembering the unbearable toll of the Shoah more broadly, and also the subsequent lives of all who escaped the genocidal net.

The voices of those who were children at the war's end remind us of the chaos and confusion that defined the moment of liberation. Looking at Holocaust survivors today, often surrounded by generations of extended family established after the war, we can forget that liberation was not pure relief, but brought waves of anxious existential questions. Who else is alive and how can I find them? How will I get along alone? Where will I live? What will I live on? Many organizations stepped into the breach and helped resolve those issues. But it's easy to underestimate the disorder and unknowingness of the mid-1940s.

One thing that gives us a sense of those fraught postwar years are the tape-recorded interviews of displaced persons conducted by David Boder, beginning in 1946. Boder, a Latvian-born Jewish American psychologist, visited DP camps in western Europe, preserving his conversations with European Jews from a range of countries using what was then state-of-the-art technology, wire tape recordings.

Boder's audio recordings allow us to hear people whose future lives had not yet been resolved, who did not yet know what would become of them or what had happened to their parents, wives, husbands, siblings and children. We hear how they crisscrossed Europe, looking for the child deposited with non-Jewish neighbours, for the wife reportedly sighted in her hometown. We hear people thinking through where to go and what to do next. We hear raw trauma, and we hear amazing resourcefulness.

We hear, as well, the shock felt by those who did not experience the Shoah themselves, as revelation after revelation surfaced about what the Jews of Europe were subjected to. In one tape, for example, Boder talks with a survivor of Auschwitz who describes the process of selection – the way in which Jews were divided into those who would be used for slave labour and those who would be killed immediately. The speaker describes the line of people walked toward the gas. Boder does not understand the reference. "Die Gasse?" he asks? The street? The lane? What street? He does not immediately understand that the speaker has not said "die Gasse" but "das Gas," the gas. Listening to the tape, we feel his horrified struggle to absorb that information.

About 15 years ago, the Illinois Institute of Technology began the process of digitizing Boder's tapes, eventually putting them online at the Voices of the Holocaust website: http://voices.iit.edu/voices_project. Taken together with the voices of living survivors among us, we see the chaos and bereavement and also the miraculous rebuilding of survival. ■

Justin Trudeau's deplorable comments

Michael Taube

We live in difficult times. Vicious terrorist groups like ISIS, al-Qaeda and Boko Haram threaten our safety and security. Last year's tragic Ottawa shootings stunned the entire nation. The senseless murders at the French satirical magazine Charlie Hebdo's building, followed by two hostage situations, shocked everyone who truly believes in democracy, liberty and freedom.

It's at times like these that we expect our leaders to make strong statements to ensure that the wars, conflicts and political battles were not fought in vain. To ensure that the principles and values we cherish will be defended at all costs. To ensure our way of life will not be threatened by the totalitarian states, rogue nations and terrorist thugs who seek to destroy it.

In my view, that's what makes Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau's recent comments about Canadian military action downright deplorable.

Trudeau was recently in London, Ont., to attend a Liberal party caucus. While in town, he engaged with local media – as most political leaders do – to drum up support.

In particular, he had an interview with AM 980 radio host Andrew Lawton. For those who aren't familiar with Lawton, he's a young, intelligent and well-spoken conservative pundit. He's quickly established his name and reputation with strong political positions and religious convictions (Christian, and firmly pro-Israel), thoughtful commentary, and solid writing and speaking skills.

For a while, the interview was uneventful. The radio host threw out typical questions, and the Liberal leader provided straightforward and/or predictable answers.

Until they moved into the issue of war and military action. Take a look at this exchange.

Andrew Lawton: So, under what circumstances as prime minister would [military action] be warranted in your eyes?

Justin Trudeau: I think it's warranted if there is a reasonable chance of success, if there's a way that Canada can offer expertise the rest of the world is unable to provide.

Andrew Lawton: Just to clarify, are you saying there's no chance of success with the fight against ISIS?

Justin Trudeau: Oh, I'm saying, this is going to be a very long, long challenge against ISIS, and Canada's role in engaging with that needs to be best suited to what we can do better than other countries.

Read it again. Trudeau, if he ever became prime minister, would send the Canadian military into battle only if he thought they could win. When Lawton gave him a second chance to clarify his statement, he dug the hole a bit deeper.

I'm a fiscal and social conservative. I have no love for the political left, including the Liberals. Yet, I can't think of any previous Liberal leader who would have ever said or believed such a foolish thing.

Would Trudeau have stayed out of the War of 1812 and World Wars I and II? All of those wars were before his time, but there was no guarantee of a "reasonable chance of success" in any instance.

Would Trudeau have enacted the War Measures Act during the FLQ crisis in October 1970? His father knew there was a huge risk, and it could have been unsuccessful. Yet, he went through with it. The son would have cowered during this difficult moment.

Let's also consider it from a Jewish perspective.

Would Trudeau have agreed to send in troops to help Jews escape from the Nazi concentration camps? Would he have fought off the enemies of the State of Israel? Or, if he was hypothetically the French prime minister, would he have sent in the military to break up the Hyper Cacher kosher market hostage situation if the police had been unsuccessful?

You get my point.

We don't fight wars and conflicts that we could win. We fight them to win.

That's really not hard to figure out, Justin. What is hard to figure out is why anyone still has faith in your political leadership. ■

A bus tour that teaches tolerance to young people

Avi Benlolo

Following the recent terror attacks at the kosher supermarket and the Charlie Hebdo offices in Paris, there seems to be a slow but inevitable awakening among western media to the reality of terrorism, and how it is gradually and insidiously infecting democratic societies. I hope this long overdue recognition will lead to an eventual change in the West's response to terror. But I am not holding my breath.

At Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC), our work is grounded in the lessons and legacy of the Holocaust, and the understanding that hatred can have tragic and horrific consequences. We cannot wait for the hatred that underlies terrorism to dissipate on its own. We must create the circumstances that foster the opposite of hatred: tolerance, respect, understanding, and a deep and abiding reverence for the values of freedom, democracy and human rights.

This is why we have developed a series of workshops devoted to teaching students and community leaders about the Holocaust, genocide, bullying, leadership and heroes. To bring these workshops beyond the Greater Toronto Area, we built a mobile classroom called the Tour for Humanity. It was launched at the end of 2013 and has, to date, visited more than 100 elementary and secondary schools, and provided programs to over 50,000 students across Ontario – from Niagara Region to Ottawa and all points in between. Importantly, 99 per cent of respondents surveyed agree the Tour for Humanity is useful in promoting awareness of important issues such as racism, tolerance and human rights

As anti-Semitism continues to rise, the Tour for Humanity provides an alternate viewpoint to impressionable young people. Dorothy Shoichet, one of the Tour for Humanity's major supporters, has noted, "In today's world reality, the Tour for Humanity stands out as one of the most creative and principled ideas for fighting anti-Semitism. In my many years of dealing with anti-Semitism, I have not come across an idea which has more potential for success than this travelling bus, which will target young minds before they are polluted by intolerance and racism."

To my knowledge we are the only organization committed to outreach to diverse populations on this scale. Every day we meet with students from a cross section of the communities that make up our multicultural province – including Mennonites, Sikhs, Muslims, Christians, Hindus, Jews and others – as we deliver content focused on the Holocaust, genocide and heroes to communities eager to hear our message of tolerance and respect for diversity. Our workshop on the Canadian experience, highlighting Canada's less-than-perfect past in dealing with native and immigrant communities, is in high demand.

I am thrilled with the achievements of the Tour for Humanity, and believe its continued success speaks to a profound need for more education on the civic values which define our society and country. The ubiquitous nature of technology has brought our global village closer together, with a resulting clash of values and belief systems. The beliefs of those who would force their ideologies on others through violence and terror have a willing audience. Tour for Humanity is the counterpoint, providing a narrative of optimism, and the conviction that everyone has the potential to make a positive difference in the world.

Like the Nazi ideology that preceded it, terrorism has sparked a global war it cannot win. History has proven time and again that respect, compassion and a profound belief in freedom will always triumph over tyranny and hate. This conviction informs the work of the Tour for Humanity.

As western leaders are drawn unwillingly into a battle they would rather avoid, I remain committed to following the advice of Anne Frank, whose wisdom continues to inspire students in the Tour for Humanity classroom: "How wonderful it is that nobody need wait a single moment before starting to improve the world." ■

Shoah, Auschwitz liberation marked in Ottawa

JORDANNA TENNEBAUM
SPECIAL TO THE CJN OTTAWA

Leading dignitaries commemorated International Holocaust Remembrance Day Jan. 27 at Ottawa City Hall, along with Holocaust survivors and more than 300 guests who gathered to observe the annual event, which this year coincided with the 70th anniversary of the liberation of the Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp.

Organizer Floralove Katz focused from the outset not only on remembering the horrors that transpired during the Shoah, but also on their enduring legacy. "Anti-Judaism has witnessed an unprecedented world growth spurt of about 30 per cent in the past year," Katz said.

B'nai Brith Canada CEO Michael Mostyn shared Katz's sentiment, emphasizing the importance of remembering one of the darkest chapters in human history and noting the growing numbers of anti-Semitic incidents.

"A new and insidious form of hatred has taken root... Jews are once again being murdered simply for being Jewish. We saw this in Jerusalem, where four rabbis and a Druze policeman were butchered," Mostyn said, referring to the November attack in the Israeli capital's Har Nof neighbourhood.

Israeli Ambassador Rafael Barak connected those deaths with recent events in Paris in which four Jewish hostages were killed at a kosher supermarket.

"Ten years ago, the United Nations passed a resolution declaring Jan. 27 as the international day to commemorate the Holocaust... Seventy years after the liberation of Auschwitz, anti-Semitism has not disappeared from the streets of Europe," Barak said.

In response to these and other attacks worldwide, Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau said Canada must work to implement the Ottawa Protocol to Combat Anti-Semitism, an international inter-parliamentary action plan signed in 2011 by the government of Canada. The document aims to eliminate anti-Semitic activity, which it views as an international threat to the Jewish People as a whole.

Federal Minister of Employment, Social Development and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney also reaffirmed a continued commitment to the Ottawa Protocol, as well as the need to remember the Holocaust.

"Elie Wiesel, the great chronicler of the Holocaust, wrote that, 'For us, forgetting was never an option'... so today, we as Canadians join together with representatives of governments of all faiths to remember in this moral act," Kenney said.

He reiterated the urgency of remembrance at a Parliament Hill assembly later in the day, where the March of the Living Digital Archives Project screened its latest production, titled Auschwitz-Birkenau: 70 Years After Liberation: A Warning to Future Generations. The short film incorporates the voices of students and five Canadian survivors who reflect on the 70th anniversary of the release of Jewish prisoners from Auschwitz-Birkenau.

"As time passes and as we mourn the passing of many members of the generation that witnessed and survived the Nazi era, it has become even more imperative for moral societies like ours to remain firm in that commitment to memory," Kenney said.

He was joined by Canada's Ambassador for Religious Freedom Andrew Bennett, British High Commissioner to Canada Howard Drake and Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas. Together the guests listened to March of the Living participant, University of Ottawa student Jaclyn Friedlich, who vowed to preserve stories of the Holocaust for future generations.

"It is the responsibility of my generation to keep history alive and ensure that the hatred and intolerance that led to the atrocities of the Holocaust are never repeated," Friedlich said.

The commemoration finished with the Canadian and Israeli national anthems and a candlelighting service honouring the lives of all those who died during the Shoah.

The House of Commons also observed the commemoration as all parties participated in a moment of silence and issued statements marking Holocaust Remembrance Day and the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz-Birkenau.■

Solutions have to be systemic and ongoing

One in four women experiences domestic abuse in their lifetime, and it occurs among Jews at the same rate as in the community at large

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Diane Sasson

For more than 25 years, Penny Krowitz has been heading Toronto's shelter for abused Jewish women and working tirelessly to advocate for victims of domestic abuse.

But she wishes she didn't have to.

"In 1989, we opened the first kosher shelter in Toronto for abused Jewish women. It is open to this day. We'd like to close it, but unfortunately, we can't," said Krowitz, executive director of the non-profit organization Act To End Violence Against Women (ATEVAW).

Krowitz and other service providers across the country who work on behalf of Jewish domestic abuse victims said raising awareness and working toward lasting solutions is the only way to eradicate domestic abuse.

"We are very committed to education and awareness. It is an important point because, for most people in our community, they don't believe it happens to us," Krowitz said.

According to the Jewish Coalition Against Domestic Abuse, one in four women experience domestic abuse during their lifetime, and abuse occurs in the Jewish community at the same rate as in the community at large.

Janice Shaw, Jewish Family & Child's York Region direct service manager, said we can't hope to solve a problem without acknowledging it first.

"At any given time, we have approximately 300 and some odd cases open... for every one that closes, three open sometimes... In spite of it all, there is still a myth that Jewish men are not abusive. And clearly our services and other services indicate that this is not that case," Shaw said.

"It is very important that there is lots of outreach and communication amongst Jewish leaders in different capacities in schools, in shuls, etc."

JF&CS runs a synagogue outreach program to encourage rabbis to speak to their congregants about the issue, and Krowitz also sees the value in using Jewish community leaders as a resource.

"I want to set up meetings with several rabbis in the Conservative movement, in the Orthodox movement, the Reform movement and go talk to them one on one about the issue and what they can do if they have a woman in their congregation who comes to them," Krowitz said.

"We would encourage... rabbis to do a sermon about it because the minute the rabbi does a sermon about it, he gives credibility to the issue."

Diane Sasson, executive director of Auberge Shalom Pour Femmes, Montreal's kosher women's shelter, also thinks having community leaders speaking out on the issue is part of the solution.

She said that over the past 15 years, she has noticed that Jewish leaders are more receptive to the goals of her organization.

Sasson referred to an article in La Voix Sépharade, a Quebec-based Jewish magazine, which highlighted religious sources to show how Judaism is meant to protect women from violence and abuse.

"We need to use the sources we have in our community, and we need to use those positive sources and really try to protect women and honour what we're supposed to honour," she said.

"We have the tools to work with, Jewishly, and I think our leaders and our rabbis need to speak about it, need to know it exists, need to talk about it, need to make internal policies in the synagogues."

Shaw agrees that for real, measurable progress to be made, the solutions have to be "more systemic than clinical.

"Overall, we really need to start educating, not only our daughters, but our sons, much, much earlier on about acceptable behaviour. And that's the systemic piece, and that's across the board. The same message needs to be given across the board."

Air, rail and security on Raitt's Israel agenda

plungen@thecjn.ca

It didn't take long for the recently initialled transportation agreements between Canada and Israel to pay off.

Sometime last week, at a location that can't be revealed, people in the security field, or maybe not, took part in an exercise that can be considered security-related, or maybe not, to prepare against threats that may or may not have to do with transportation.

At least, that's what can be gleaned from reading between the lines of an interview with federal Transportation Minister Lisa Raitt, fresh from a recent visit to Israel.

She was part of a delegation of Canadian officials, including Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird, who signed several agreements enhancing commercial and security relationship between the two countries.

The agreements initialled by Raitt include an air transport agreement, a declaration of intent on aviation security and a memorandum of understanding on transportation. The deals were signed less than a year after Prime Minister Stephen Harper visited Israel and concluded a memorandum of understanding that contemplated further agreements to enhance trade and other relations.

Raitt was reluctant to reveal too much about security co-operation, but did acknowledge that "there was a security exercise carried out and Canada and Israel both took part in it. It was with our officials from Transport Canada in a real-time situation. I can't tell you what the exercise was, but I can tell you it did happen and it's that kind of co-operation that the second agreement that we signed will help facilitate and draw us all closer together."

Was the exercise in Canada?

"I can't tell you."

Staying on the security theme, Raitt said she visited the port of Ashdod and saw how security was balanced with "the need to be productive. Fascinating to see how technology is being used."

"There's a lot there our ports can learn from," and Israel can also learn from processes at the port of Vancouver, she said.

Rail was another area of transportation that was discussed during her visit. "People [in Israel] want to see mass transit though rail," she said.

Her visit took her to Sderot, near the Gaza border, where she toured a fortified train station. "It's interesting to see that every facet of your life, including transportation, you have to think about security," Raitt said. "We're getting to a place here in Canada where we have to think about security more and more as well. We're not immune. This terrorism is hitting all shores, and we have to make sure we don't take it lightly. We need to do what we can."

Raitt also met with representatives of Bombardier, "which has a great book of business in Israel," she said.

The air transport agreement could see more commercial flights between the countries, Raitt continued. It "allows for greater flexibility for flights from Tel Aviv to Canada in general, and from Canada to Tel Aviv. That was important, as we know there can be greater demand for air travel back and forth. We're liberalizing and making it easier to do so."

She said more direct flights to Israel from other Canadian cities would depend on the airlines and whether the flights are warranted. "I know there's a lot of interest in a Montreal flight. Our purpose is to make sure we've opened up greater flexibility for carriers to provide those services."

Raitt said she visited an Israel Aerospace Industries facility and discussed its development of drones, adding there may be Canadian applications for the unmanned aerial vehicles, "utilizing them... for the northern part of our country, in terms of observing spills, if there are any, and doing search and rescue."

Lisa Raitt gives Israeli Transport Minister Yisrael Katz a jersey from Canada's world junior championship team.

Raitt was impressed with the vitality of Israel high-tech industry. "We ended up going to visit a start-up place, an area where people with small start-up companies go to get help to get them off the ground," she said. "And the energy, the entrepreneurship and the innovation that is happening is fascinating. That is an area we can certainly learn from in Canada and it's something we should welcome investment in and investment back, too."

Raitt's visit to Israel was her second. In 2004, she was part of a UJA mission, that focused in large part on the security challenges facing Israel at the time. ■

B'nai Brith's Jewish Tribune suspends print edition

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

The Jewish Tribune, a weekly newspaper published by B'nai Brith Canada, announced Jan. 29 that it would be suspending production of its print edition.

Sam Eskenasi, a B'nai Brith spokesperson, said "the Jewish Tribune will be temporarily suspending publication of its print edition, but continue with its online offerings to re-examine the best ways the print edition can service the community. During this phase, the Tribune will continue to offer top notch content on their website at www.jewishtribune.ca.

"This decision was made by the Tribune management with the best interest of the paper in mind, and readers will be updated with information as soon as it becomes available."

According to JTA, the suspension of the print edition will last 13 weeks.

Frank Dimant, former B'nai Brith CEO and publisher of the Tribune, who stepped down last fall after 36 years as head of the Jewish advocacy organization and was replaced by Michael Mostyn, said he was saddened when he heard the news.

"I'm always saddened when any institution in the Jewish community ceases to operate, even for a little time. I'm hopeful they will be able to restructure, because I believe that multiple opinions in the community that are legitimate have a place," he said.

Dimant said that the newspaper, which was originally called The Covenant, has been in print since 1964. It has been known as the Jewish Tribune for about 20 years.

A number of community newspapers in Ontario have suffered a similar fate over the past few years, citing financial difficulties due to a lack of advertising revenue.

In 2013, the Town Crier, a chain of community newspapers serving several Toronto neighbourhoods, announced that it would be suspending publication of its newspapers indefinitely. The Corriere Canadese, an Italian-language paper and one of Canada's oldest community publications, also suspended its operations in 2013.

In April of that year, The CJN announced that it would be shutting its doors, citing financial difficulties due to a drop in advertising and subscriptions, but an outcry from the Jewish community spurred CJN management to restructure and redesign the paper. Production resumed a few months later.

Commenting on the Tribune's suspension of its print edition, Suanne Kelman, professor emeritus of journalism at Ryerson University, said, "As a journalist, I'm concerned about our problems finding viable business models for traditional media. As a Jew, I find it sad that the sense of community seems to have declined so rapidly."

Efforts to reach Mostyn by The CJN's deadline were unsuccessful. ■

The newspaper has been in print since 1964.

Shoah memorial likely returning to Halifax's Pier 21

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The search for a home for the Wheel of Conscience may be over.

The museum piece, designed to remind spectators that in 1939, Canada turned away the MS St. Louis and its 937 passengers fleeing the Nazis, may be returning to its old home at the Canadian Museum of Immigration at Pier 21 in Halifax.

Bernie Farber, former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said Jan. 27 "the museum is taking it back."

"It's going to be given pride of place, recognizing how important this is to Canada."

But Martin Sampson, director of communications for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said it's a little premature to say the Wheel of Conscience is going back to Pier 21. "The partners working on this are not ready" to confirm that, he said. "We're very encouraged, but discussions are still ongoing. We're not ready to make a final announcement yet."

For the past few months, the Wheel of Conscience has been housed in a warehouse owned by its fabricators, Soheil Mosun Limited, where it was shipped for repairs.

Last November, museum CEO Marie Chapman said the sculpture had been prone to breakdowns. A black dust formed on its gears and a burning smell arises from it.

Nate Leipciger with the sculpture at the Soheil Mosun factory in Toronto in November 2014

Farber said "It's working perfectly now. There's absolutely nothing wrong with it."

Farber credited a campaign by Holocaust survivors, including Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors and Descendants, and senior government officials, with influencing the apparent decision to restore the wheel to what he called its rightful place at Pier 21. The survivors group was sent an email this week saying the Wheel will return to the Halifax-based museum.

"I feel very strongly that it should stay in Halifax at Pier 21," said Nate Leipciger, a survivor of Auschwitz and past co-president of the survivors group.

It was designed with that venue in mind and "the government agreed to commemorate [the St. Louis] at Pier 21, so that's where it should stay," he said.

Last November, news reports indicated the wheel had been in storage in Toronto since the summer and that Halifax's salt air might have been contributing to its frequent breakdowns. An alternate venue for the exhibit was being contemplated.

But Farber rejected suggestions the sculpture could be housed elsewhere.

"It belongs at Pier 21," he said. "It is the only public symbol of Holocaust remembrance in the country."

"I am very hopeful it is going to go back. There are still some details to be worked out," Sampson said.

In 1939, the Canadian government refused to allow the St. Louis to land at Pier 21. The governments of Cuba and the United States also turned it away. The ship was forced to return to Europe, where its passengers were disembarked in a number of countries. It's estimated that 254 of them were killed in the Holocaust.

Canadian Jewish Congress spearheaded an effort to commemorate the historical incident. It obtained a $500,000 grant from the government of Canada and commissioned renowned architect Daniel Libeskind, himself the child of survivors, to design the piece. The sculpture was installed at the Canadian Museum of Immigration at Pier 21 in Halifax in 2011.

The museum is currently undergoing renovations and expansion. It is expected to reopen in May. ■

Toronto couple honoured by NCSY for their dedication

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

David Woolf remembers being 21 years old and taking a job, along with his wife, Fran, teaching Jewish studies and Hebrew at the Talmud Torah in Windsor, Ont., where he was doing an MBA.

"We were newly married," Woolf said, "and somebody there advertised an NCSY Shabbaton happening in Cleveland. NCSY [the international youth movement of the Orthodox Union] wasn't doing much at the time in Canada. So we went, and were blown away by the informal education that was happening there at a much faster rate than we could do formally in the classroom, in terms of making kids proud of their Judaism and heritage."

Some 50 years later, David and Fran Woolf are being honoured by NCSY at its 20th annual Ben Zakkai Honor Society's national scholarship reception, Feb. 8, at New York City's Jewish Heritage Museum.

The Fran and David Woolf Legacy Fund, which will provide scholarships for NCSY programs, will be inaugurated at the reception, and the Woolfs will receive the Enid and Harold H. Boxer Memorial Award, named after the original NCSY founders.

David and Fran Woolf

In a statement released by NCSY Canada, the couple is being recognized for their "lifetime of dedication to the Jewish future."

In 1971, after moving from Windsor back to Toronto, where both grew up, the couple worked to help establish Toronto as a full-time region of NCSY, which was founded in the United States in 1954 and divided into different geographic regions throughout North America, and to contribute to the expansion of NCSY Canada, which now spans the country.

They helped develop programs including Torah High, which offers Jewish studies courses for Jewish public school students.

"There were some programs [in Toronto] but it wasn't a full-time, dedicated operation," David said. "We took it to the next level... [NCSY Canada] has become much bigger than we thought — and has had a tremendous effect on teenagers – a very difficult time in one's life to address things like heritage."

David, who worked for 36 years as a sales manager for Royal Group Technologies, became chairman of the board of NCSY Canada, a post he recently retired from, after 40 years.

Rabbi Glenn Black, CEO of NCSY Canada, referred to the Woolfs as "pioneers in the kiruv [outreach] movement... In all walks of life, they have clearly demonstrated their devotion to traditional Jewish values, and they stand as exceptional role models to our young people."

David, who was born in England and came to Canada in 1950 with his parents, attended Eitz Chaim Schools, Ner Israel Yeshiva and William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, and did his undergraduate degree at the University of Toronto.

His involvement with the Jewish community has included a tenure as vice-president of the board of JF&CS in the mid 1970s, executive board membership at COR and active involvement at his synagogue, Congregation B'nai Torah.

Fran, who was born to Holocaust survivors in the Bergen-Belsen displaced persons camp, attended Associated Hebrew Schools and The Anne and Max Tanenbuam Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

She subsequently worked as a teacher in the Windsor public schools system and at the Talmud Torah in Windsor's Shaar Hashomayim Congregation. She has also taught cooking classes through COR kosher certification and at Ulpanat Orot High School, as well as privately.

"It's sort of humbling," David said of their being honoured. "We did work hard, but we weren't the only ones doing it. It's a big honour for us that they've singled us out, and if it's a way to encourage others to get involved and work toward a goal, then it's worth it." ■

UNBUNDLING: IS IT SAVING MONEY OR PERFORMING SELF-SURGERY?

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 33 years

Sisyphus is a figure of Greek mythology who was condemned to repeat forever the same meaningless task of pushing a boulder up a mountain, only to see it roll down again.

A spouse who seeks justice from Ontario's Family Courts often feels like Sisyphus, except at least the Greek hero didn't have to cash in his/her RRSPs to fund legal fees in order to roll up that boulder. The Judges are not at fault. They work very hard for a system that is overtaxed, often with people that come to them without legal representation and without the assistance of a sufficient number of other Family Law judges to share the caseload. For instance, in Newmarket Family Court, there are now fewer Judges than ever to handle what appears to be an increasing case load.

So Sisyphus just keeps pushing that boulder when a competent lawyer might have dissuaded him not to bother or to have it settled on reasonable terms given the lawyer's knowledge that Sisyphus doesn't possess. Many simply can't afford any lawyer and don't qualify for legal aid. We need to find a solution to help such people without forcing them to represent themselves. Duty counsel currently can only provide limited assistance at first appearances. Then again, there are others who can afford a lawyer but would rather buy a nicer looking car or take a trip to Vegas than retain experienced counsel. These are the self-represented litigants who waste the Court's time with their lack of legal knowledge and procedure.

Alternatively, many have now turned to a new fad called "unbundling of services." Moreover, the Court's Rules have recently changed to permit "limited retainers" to permit such practices. So what is 'unbundling' of services" actually mean? In short, if you don't have all the money needed to hire a lawyer you retain him (or her) for part of the work you can't do yourself, such as legal research or having the lawyer in court speak on your behalf once or twice, but not for the whole case. Or you might just hire this professional for advice and to draft all the paperwork, while you actually represent yourself in open court. With the right counsel, unbundling can save a litigant a great deal of money. However problems have come up. Many people can be given written materials prepared by a lawyer, including a book of cases (legal precedents) and written legal principles to argue, but then not have the foggiest idea how to present them or how to defend themselves when challenged by the Court or opposing counsel. Court can be a frightening experience to someone who is not legally trained. It can be akin to being given a scalpel to some and told to conduct surgery on oneself after being given a few diagrams. Then again, certain articulate clients may feel quite comfortable and competent to present their own arguments, especially if the matter is straightforward. I wouldn't judge all such cases and have seen both disaster and successful results. Secondly, if you are only having a lawyer speak on your behalf on one or two occasions, there are so many limitation periods, time traps, rules of procedure, and mandatory filing requirements that the layman must obtain a great deal of advice beyond hiring the lawyer to speak. So is unbundling a good idea? It may be a very risky way to proceed. It is always better to retain competent counsel.

Veteran journalist says Mideast reporting can be unreliable

plungen@thecjn.ca

Mark Lavie spent 40 years as a journalist in the Middle East, including two years living in Egypt, and he suggests consumers of the media should be cautious about accepting at face value what they read or hear.

There are big stories that go untold, as reporters pursue a narrative that more readily fits their worldview, and there are intimidation and threats that prevent full reporting from trouble spots like Gaza and the West Bank. What you get is not necessarily what's really happening in these regions, he said.

Lavie, who has worked as a radio correspondent for CBC, Associated Press (AP) and NBC-Mutual Radio, is retired and living in Israel. But in his long career, he's seen it all: how journalists are threatened not to report items that might embarrass Hamas, and how they ignore important stories.

Reporters covering the Middle East, for instance, often adopt a good guy/bad guy narrative. The Palestinians are seen as the underdog, and hence the good guys, and the Israelis are left with the role of bad guy. It takes a strong-willed reporter to put that view aside, he said.

In addition, Hamas makes it clear that journalists might not be safe if they cross certain lines. Journalists in Gaza have been kidnapped, and during last summer's Operation Protective Edge, Hamas thugs visited AP and "tore up the office" after a rocket attack was launched from next door. "The message was very clear."

Few western news agencies reported on rocket attacks from civilian areas, even though reporters knew what was happening. Almost everyone was on board with the Palestinian narrative that only civilians were casualties of Israeli attacks, he said.

Lavie said during the conflict, cameras outside al-Shifa Hospital in Gaza filmed civilians as they were brought in for treatment. But the had to stop recording when Hamas military personnel were brought in.

Illustrating how the media can skew a narrative in one direction, Lavie noted how AP ran a story 16 times about an Orthodox Israeli woman being seated in the back of a bus, but ignored the widespread "oppression" of women in Egypt.

He pointed to incidents of sexual harassment, "groping and worse," suffered by female employees on their way to work at the AP office in Cairo. "In a two-block walk, my colleague faced four [incidents] of harassment," said Lavie, author of Broken Spring, a look at the rise and fall of the Arab Spring.

Mark Lavie

Another untold story is the state of the economy in Egypt, which has left 40 per cent of the population living on less than $2 a day, well below the poverty line.

Asked about the upcoming Israeli election, scheduled for March 17, Lavie said it would likely be decided on domestic issues, such as the economy, inequality, the role of the ultra-Orthodox in society and the country's faltering eduction system.

Israelis don't put much stock in negotiations with the Palestinians, especially after two offers for statehood were turned down by the Palestinian leadership, he said.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's planned address to a joint session of the U.S. Congress won't hurt his electoral chances, even if it has angered the Barack Obama administration, he said.

"It will help him. Most Israeli people agree with his policy. Most Israelis believe Obama is hostile to Israel, despite evidence to the contrary. They like to see the prime minister flex his muscle."

As for the recent flare-up with Hezbollah, Lavie does not believe it will lead to a wider conflict. "It's clear neither Hezbollah nor its Iran backers want this to spiral out of control," he said. "But you never know. It takes one incident – a rocket attack on a school – and there you go. You're playing with fire, and you never know how it's going to end."

Lavie's Toronto visit was co-ordinated by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs. It included a public lecture at Temple Sinai sponsored by CIJA, Temple Sinai and ARZA Canada.

His Toronto visit was part of a larger speaking tour that includes stops in Baltimore, Washington, Michigan State, Kalamazoo College, Fort Wayne and Pasadena. ■

GUEST VOICE

University free speech can be unsettling

Martin Lockshin, Sara R. Horowitz, Michael Brown and Carl S. Ehrlich

Universities are disquieting places. Inevitably, university students hear new and challenging approaches to politics, economics, sexuality and religion that challenge their values.

And that's just from their professors! From classmates, they hear an even wider range of viewpoints, without the filter that most professors employ. As Canadian universities strive to make education accessible to a broader swath of the population, students encounter classmates from segments of society they never met before.

In some schools, such as ours, York University, many are the first in their family to attend university. Others come from families familiar with higher education. In any case, students come to university with diverse sets of values and biases.

No statement by a student or professor reflects the values of the university. In fact, it is difficult to identify the values of any secular university, other than the free exchange of ideas.

A telling example of unsettling free speech on campus was a poorly written and argued editorial entitled "In response to Charlie Hebdo" that appeared recently in the York student newspaper, Excalibur. The writer decried religious extremism, offensively lumping together "ultra-Orthodox Jews" refusing to sit beside women on airplanes with the "gunmen" (not terrorists, and not identified by religious or ethnic affiliation) who "killed 12 individuals" at the Charlie Hebdo weekly. The author also omitted the murder of Jews two days later at the Hyper Cacher, buying food for Shabbat.

What reaction is appropriate to an article like that? The best reaction has already taken place. Current and former York students have written cogent, forceful responses, highlighting the contemptible nature of the editorial. Good speech is the best way to fight bad speech. In fact, web searches for this editorial this week are more likely to yield the students' reactions to the editorial than the editorial itself. That's great!

Can concerned people outside the university do anything to help? There is no simple answer to this question, but some things they should not do. They should not ask the university administration to censor the student newspaper. Universities are neither elementary schools nor houses of worship. Authority figures cannot tell students what to write. If the newspaper has not broken the laws of Canada, it is irrelevant that it has broken the standards of good taste. Student newspapers offend regularly all over the world.

Universities are neither elementary schools nor houses of worship. Authority figures cannot tell students what to write. If the newspaper has not broken the laws of Canada, it is irrelevant that it has broken the standards of good taste. Student newspapers offend regularly all over the world.

Nor does it make sense to look for a university in Canada where offensive editorials will not be found.

Anyone who thinks that the student newspaper at York occasionally offends Jews because York is the problem does not realize the extent of antipathy towards Israeli policies, and often toward Israel itself, among young people (mostly non-Jews) in our country. This is a serious problem that cannot be solved by finding another university. Anti-Israel and anti-Jewish sentiment is not concentrated in one location. We ignore that reality at our peril! It gets noticed more here because of York's large cohort of vocal, Israel-friendly students (and faculty) who challenge offending articles, and because of York's location in Toronto. At universities with fewer committed Jews and no large Jewish community nearby, no one sounds the alarm.

Anywhere students go these days, including Israel, they will hear professors and classmates calling Israel an apartheid state, supporting boycotts, divestment and sanctions, and spreading calumnies about Israeli genocide. The most reasonable thing for the community is to encourage students to attend universities where involved Jews, whatever their personal commitments to Judaism and Israel, can find support. At York they can associate with committed, articulate young people who speak up for a variety of Jewish causes. Students can't avoid discomfort by studying in the hinterland. There they'll encounter the same anti-Zionism without a critical mass of pro-Israel students with whom to associate, and without the infrastructure of Jewish life available at York (a kosher restaurant, close relations with Israeli universities, Jewish studies, and many Jewish faculty members involved with the community). That would certainly not serve the best interests of the Jewish community.

Differing, free-wheeling – and sometimes deeply offensive – ideas are among the challenges of university life. They are also great benefits to students. They help them sharpen ideas and learn to defend their positions to people who think differently or who have not yet formed an opinion – things we all must do in a free and diverse country. ■

Video project links Hamilton kids to Jews worldwide

HOLLY GINSLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, HAMILTON

In an effort to nurture a strong connection to Judaism among its congregational school students, Temple Anshe Shalom in Hamilton has started a "Jewish Video Pen Project."

This year's theme for all student activities at the synagogue has been "building strong Jewish identities," so Laura Wolfson, the temple's educator, decided to look for a unique initiative that would help answer the question of what it takes to do just that.

"I started thinking about what it means for a child to have a Jewish identity and to understand herself or himself as a Jew in the 21st century," Wolfson says.

As part of the Jewish Video Pen Pal Project, students in grades 3 to 7 made a video tour of the shul, which included short interviews with spiritual leader Rabbi Jordan Cohen and with each other describing their experiences being Jewish in Hamilton, Ont., and being part of the 350-member temple.

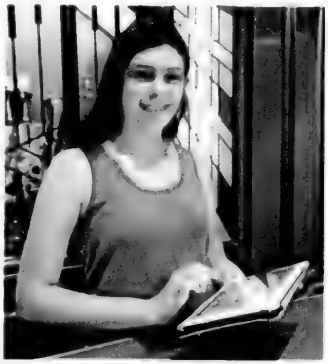
One of the shul's teens edited the various interviews together into an 11-minute video and uploaded it to YouTube with a private link. Wolfson then sent email invitations to other synagogues around the world inviting them to participate in the pen pal project.

Although the actual filming by the children was done over two days using iPads, the script-writing took about three weeks. The 20 children who took part – out of a total of 55 kids in the temple's twice-weekly congregational school – worked on the project during their Wednesday-afternoon classes.

They wrote the scripts with these questions in mind: what would they like to show visually about Temple Anshe Sholom for people who've never been there, and what kind of questions should they ask each other as part of the video?

The children were divided up into pairs – each with one child from an older grade and one from a younger grade – to film the various tours. Each pair filmed a different part of the tour: there was the sanctuary, the chapel, the classrooms, the auditoriums, each other, and, of course, the rabbi.

Wolfson found other Hebrew schools to participate in the project by looking on the World Union for Progressive Judaism's website, which lists all the liberal synagogues outside North America. She sent emails to synagogues in South Africa, Great Britain, Ireland and Australia to join the project. She also invited Hebrew schools in eastern and western Canada to take part and ended up with a connection in Halifax, and she's currently working on one with Vancouver.



Hannah Byrne-Wolfson uses an iPad to film the Jewish Video Pen Pal project.

There are also interested Hebrew schools in Portland, Oregon, Philadelphia, and Michigan. These cities have received Temple Anshe Sholom's video and will be sending back their own this month. As well, the temple recently received its first pen pal video from Cape Town, South Africa.

She asked her students to critique their own video and suggest what they might film for the next one. The students said they could record some of their activities, such as classroom work, singing and services, as well as introduce their teachers.

"Another thing that I would like to see come out of this is for the kids to do more research about the temple, about what goes on in the temple," Wolfson says. "I would like them to know that there is a board and committees and a wide range of activities that happen in the temple, aside from their religious school. We have a very rich history, and there is so much more that they could learn about that as a result of doing this project."

Wolfson hopes the pen pal project can become an annual thing – for example, there could be Chanukah videos and Purim videos going back and forth each year.

"I want these children to have a strong sense of themselves as Jews, and that's a much bigger project than just teaching them Hebrew prayers and the customs of all our holidays and how we mark lifecycle events." ■

GUEST VOICE

Joseph Rotman's gifts to our country will endure

The following is excerpted from Gov. Gen. David Johnston's eulogy delivered last Friday in Toronto at the funeral of businessman and philanthropist Joseph Rotman.

DAVID JOHNSTON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Joe Rotman and I first met while I was serving as president of the University of Waterloo. He was representing the Rotman School of Management which, with his support, was well on its way from being a good business school to becoming an extraordinary one.

I quickly realized that one of the secrets to the school's success was Joe's ability to identify, support and mentor great leaders—people like Roger Martin, and later, Tiff Macklem and Amit Chakma.

Joe understood that an organization, much like a country, is about people, and that success means surrounding yourself with the most creative, motivated, compassionate and talented people you can find.

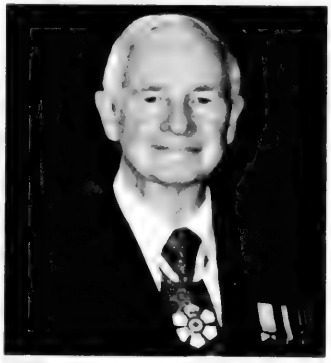
Joe was passionate about so many causes: education, innovation, the arts, business, health care and many charitable endeavours. I think of Proverbs 18:15: "The heart of the prudent getteth knowledge; and the ear of the wise seeketh knowledge."

His competence was so broad that he was able to contribute wisely to each of them. He was truly a man for all seasons.

But Joe would be the first to admit that he only achieved the great heights that he did because of his capacity to recruit others to the cause. He was dedicated to his work, and his ability to communicate his passion to others convinced them to get involved and give their time, talent and resources. He would fondly describe this approach as "venture philanthropy."

It's a lesson that I have taken to heart in my own life and work, and I know the same is true for many others.

When I consider the strength of Canada today, I see Joe's influence reflected in so many ways. As a philanthropist, he gave generously of his time, his talent and his treasure. His commitment to education benefited a number of institutions, including the University of Toronto and Western University, where he served as chancellor until his passing.



David Johnston

I know his absence will be felt in those organizations in which he was actively involved, including the Canada Council for the Arts, where he had served as chair since 2008.

He once said: "Supporting the arts is supporting the vitality of this country," a statement which reflected the richness of his understanding. He knew an organization, a community, a country thrives best when a diversity of voices are expressed and heard and when we are able to "see things whole," as E.B. White put it.

This perspective is what made Joe such a valued member of the advisory council for the Order of Canada. He himself was invested as an Officer of the Order in 1995 as a true exemplar of its motto: Desiderantes meliorem patriam – They desire a better country.

When we look at his life, we see Joe epitomized beautifully what it means to be both smart and caring. He lived these principles every day through his actions and his commitment to the common good.

When I think of Joe, I think of the old proverb: "Blessed is the man who plants a tree knowing he will not be there to enjoy its shade."

Joe Rotman was that man, and his gifts to our country will endure. He was a great leader, colleague, philanthropist, friend and family member. He will be missed by many. ■

David Johnston is Governor General of Canada.

Joseph Rotman UNIVERSITY OF WESTERN ONTARIO

Joseph and Sandra Rotman YOUTUBE SCREEN SHOT

Notable Jewish businessman and philanthropist Joseph Rotman passed away Jan. 27 at age 80.

Rotman, born in Toronto in 1935, was most widely known for his affiliation with the business school of his alma mater, the University of Toronto, of which he was the chief benefactor, donating some $42 million to the school. It was renamed the Rotman School of Management in 1997.

"The University of Toronto, and indeed all of Canada, has lost one of its greatest champions," said U of T president Meric Gertler. "Joseph Rotman believed that each of us has a responsibility to help build civil society. He had great faith in young Canadians, in their eagerness and ability to lead the way in that cause. And he was supremely confident in Canada's ability to compete and to contribute on the global stage."

Rotman also dedicated himself to creating Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute (RRI), a premier centre for the study of human brain function, established in 1989.

He was instrumental in establishing Baycrest's affiliation with U of T, and helped recruit some of the world's top cognitive scientists to the institute, including its founding director, Dr. Donald Stuss.

"For me personally, Joe was an inspiration and a fabulous source of mentorship, advice and support," said Dr. William Reichman, president and CEO of Baycrest. "His passing is a great loss for our entire community and for Baycrest."

Rotman was also a staunch supporter of the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, providing seed money to facilitate its opening in 1967 and remaining a major donor to the museum's capital projects throughout the years.

In the 1990s, Rotman served as national chair of the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum (CFIM), the museum's fundraising arm and was awarded the museum's highest honour of an honorary fellowship.

"He was a real champion for the Israel Museum in Canada," said Pearl Berman, national director of CFIM.

Rotman and his wife Sandra both sat on numerous boards and have donated more than $90 million to causes they cared deeply about, such as the arts, education and health care.

In 1995, Rotman was appointed an officer of the Order of Canada and elected to the Canadian Business Hall of Fame.

His illustrious business career began in the early 1960s, when he got his start trading oil. He went on to work at real estate and venture capital companies, and to establish a number of companies of his own, both private and public, in oil trading, petroleum distribution, oil and gas exploration, merchant banking, real estate and venture capital.

Rotman was also the founder of several oil and gas companies, including Tarragon Oil and Gas. The list of companies he helped to grow includes Premdor and Barrick Gold Corporation.

In 1987, Rotman founded the merchant bank and private equity management firm Clairvest Group Inc.

Rotman was praised as a leader and city builder by politicians such as Toronto mayor John Tory and Ontario Minister of Health Eric Hoskins, both of whom lamented his passing on Twitter.

"My dear friend and mentor Joe Rotman, rest in peace. You lived a great life of generosity, compassion and brilliance. I am heartbroken," Hoskins tweeted Jan. 27.

"Mr. Rotman was a true city builder, demonstrating a commitment to developing Canadian institutions in the arts, education and health care," Tory tweeted.

Rotman's dedication and patronage to the arts was evident from his service as chair of the board of the Art Gallery of Ontario from 1993 to 1996, as a member of the board of the Governor General's Performing Arts Awards from 1996 to 1998, and as chair of the Canada Council of the Arts from 2008 to 2013.

In addition to his involvement with U of T, the Rotmans supported the University of Western Ontario by endowing the Rotman Institute of Philosphy – Enaging Science, a centre that works to bridge the humanities and the sciences, and through his establishment of the Rotman Canada Research Chair in the Philosophy of Science.

His contribution to the field of life sciences and innovation is demonstrated by the 1989 development of the Rotman Research Institute, established to build knowledge around cognitive neuroscience, and his founding and being a member of the board of directors of Toronto's Medical and Related Sciences Discovery District (MARS).

He is survived by his wife, Sandra, and their two children, Janis and Kenneth, as well as three grandchildren. ■

Ex-B'nai Brith CEO to helm pro-Israel Christian group

sshefa@thecjn.ca

After stepping down from his 36-year post as B'nai Brith Canada's CEO, Frank Dimant has been appointed to lead Christians United For Israel (CUFI) Canada, a coalition of Christian organizations that advocate for Israel.

"When I announced that I was leaving B'nai Brith [last summer], I was approached by people from CUFI... they wanted to ensure that a strong activist Jewish voice not be lost, especially at this time, because... today it is imperative that the Jewish community and the Christian community stand united against a common enemy, a common threat," said Dimant, adding that B'nai Brith has had a working relationship with CUFI for about 15 years, doing joint pro-Israel programming.

Dimant becomes CUFI Canada's first-ever CEO.

Charles McVety, president of the Canadian Christian College and the national chair of CUFI Canada, whose American affiliate is the largest pro-Israel organization in the United States, with more than one million members, agreed that a partnership between the Christian and Jewish communities is essential, given the rise of radical Islam.

"We've been working with Frank for many years supporting Israel. However, of late, with the rapid increase of persecution of Christians around the world, and the persecution of Jews around the world, we feel a very deep sense that the only way to go forward for peace and safety and security is for Christians and Jews to work together to combat this horrible, offensive, radical Islamic attack," McVety said.

Dimant said it's important for the Jewish community to build bridges with the evangelical movement.

"When there was a concern in our community that there was going to be an influx of missionaries called Jews for Jesus, Charles McVety, as president of the Canada Christian College and also as chair of CUFI, Rabbi [Moshe] Stern from Shaarei Tefillah, and myself, gave a national press conference denouncing that kind of activity," Dimant said.

"For evangelical leaders to stand up and do that was very important to our community and demonstrative of their position against trying to convert Jews, so I'm glad to be working with individuals like that."

Dimant, who will continue his role as dean of the Modern Israel Studies program at the Canada Christian College, said he is looking forward to building upon what he calls "the strongest pro-Israel advocacy organization in the country."

"I would like to see a growth. I would like to see a much higher profile for the organization along the lines of the American CUFI and I think that will be doable and something we're putting into plan," Dimant said.

"We're looking at accelerating missions to Israel... educating Christians about modern Israel and the historical claim that we have through the Bible," he added. "That is very imperative because we have certain elements within Christianity that deny that claim, so we're not only talking directly to believers, but to those who may have a misconception in interpreting the Old Testament."

McVety said he's confident the organization will continue to thrive under Dimant's leadership.

"It makes a lot of sense for one of Canada's most notable Jewish leaders to join hands with a very large and strong organization supporting Israel," he said.

"We revere him as a great leader and we believe that he is going to be able to build this organization and build an even stronger support for Israel in Canada."■

FAST launches high school anti-racism curriculum

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Despite the recent passing of Elizabeth Comper, philanthropist and co-founder of Fighting Antisemitism Together (FAST), the organization is moving forward with its mission to educate Canadian students about the dangers of hate in all its forms.

Later this year, FAST will officially launch its latest educational tool for high school teachers and students called Voices into Action, following the success of its first initiative called Choose Your Voice – an award-winning program that has reached more than two million students since 2005.

Choose Your Voice, the foundation for the latest initiative, was developed with the help of educators and what was then the Canadian Jewish Congress, to provide middle school teachers with tools to incorporate material about the history of anti-Semitism and racism into the curriculum.

Nicole Miller, executive director of FAST – a coalition of non-Jewish Canadian business and community leaders who fund projects that encourage other non-Jews to speak out – explained that following the success of Choose Your Voice, they saw the need for a similar program for high schools.

Voices into Action, an interactive site developed in accordance with provincial curriculum standards by a team of teachers, curriculum experts, graduate students, university professors, and consultants, contains five units that focus on issues related to human rights, genocide, prejudice and discrimination.

"It's divided into five units and the Holocaust is a major feature throughout. It is at least a third of the content," Miller said.

Although the program addresses racism, bigotry and hate in all forms, there is a special emphasis on anti-Semitism and the Holocaust.

The founders of FAST, Elizabeth Comper, and her husband Tony, a retired Bank of Montreal CEO, were inspired to create the organization after a series of anti-Semitic attacks in Toronto and Montreal, including the 2004 firebombing of Montreal's United Talmud Torah Jewish day school.

"It was important to address other human rights issues, to put them on a scale, to understand that the Holocaust was as far as you could go with hatred," Miller said.

"The Holocaust is the first chapter of units 1, 2, 3 and 4, and unit 5 is entirely about the Holocaust and it ends with a conclusion on contemporary anti-Semitism."

FAST executive director Nicole Miller

Miller added that most important is the fact that the high school program is curriculum-based and completely free of charge.

"We're not trying to make more work for teachers. They just don't have time so it's important that it meets the provincial curriculum requirements for a lot of different courses. But mostly in social studies and language arts, which includes English and French – our programs are completely bilingual," she said.

She said when teachers register online, they can customize the material to complement their lesson plans.

Some of the subjects explored include the Holocaust, the "Aboriginal Experience," gender issues, cyber bullying and the history of Chinese immigration to Canada.

"There is a whole chapter on cyber bullying, which is really, really important. It doesn't matter what subject you teach, whether you're a science or math teacher, that could become an issue," Miller said.

She said although there are many great programs available to teachers that promote human rights, tolerance and counter anti-Semitism, Voices into Action is unique.

"Our model is a little different. We don't teach the students. We give material to teachers… once they review and assess our programs, they help promote it because they see how great these resources are." ■

Trent group apology rejected, anti-Israel policy rescinded

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) has rejected an apology from student groups at Trent University for a poster the FSWC says uses anti-Semitic imagery to promote a "Divestment Week" event.

Ontario Public Interest Research Group (OPIRG) Peterborough, a student-run group, partnered with another student group called Sustainable Trent to hold an event from Jan. 26 to 30 that, in part, targets Israel for "its occupation of Palestine."

To advertise the week-long event, OPIRG distributed posters that depict a traffic light. In one of the traffic lights is a Star of David with a red cross through it, reminiscent of a no-smoking sign.

When FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo found out about the event and the imagery being used to promote it, he condemned OPIRG for continuing to promote an anti-Israel agenda.

"They simply don't understand that not only is it offensive to have crossed off the Magen David – it is not a surprise to me that they would do that because of their staunch anti-Semitism… – but only pointing a finger at Israel, is anti-Semitic in and of itself," Benlolo said.

On Jan. 25, OPIRG and Sustainable Trent apologized for the poster. "Our intent in using the Israeli flag on our poster was to bring attention to the global boycott, divestment, and sanctions (BDS) movement that exists in response to Israel's occupation of Palestine, and to criticize the oppressive actions of the state of Israel. We regret that in our use of Israel's flag on the poster, the focal point became the Star of David and not the flag as a symbol of a nation state," they said.

Benlolo wasn't satisfied. "We don't accept their apology… for the reason that they don't really get it," he said.

Rebecca Hubble, 20, a third-year political studies student and a volunteer with the student group Trent4Israel, also felt the apology wasn't genuine. "It seemed they were blaming us for misinterpreting their logo and advertisements… they don't really seem to acknowledge the anti-Semitic image that they are still putting forward with their BDS movement," she said.

Although OPIRG said it retracted the poster and removed it from its online sites, Hubble, who is Christian, said the posters remained all over campus last week.

"They're still up. They put up a big banner at the library that says '[Divestment from] Israeli apartheid' and they are still very visible on campus," she said.

A banner at Trent University last week

Benlolo said he's been informing university boards about student groups that host anti-Israel and anti-Semitic events on campuses across the country.

"The boards of directors of these universities should take responsibility… for the organization they lead," Benlolo said, adding that he's communicated with Trent's president and told him "he should take a principled stand and the university should take responsibility for what is going on."

Trent president Leo Groarke said the administration has spoken to both sides and commended them for being "level-headed." He said Trent "upholds academic freedom as another important value. Such freedom does not permit everything, but it does incorporate the freedom of discussion and debate for students and faculty on complex and sometimes difficult issues."

OPIRG Peterborough co-ordinator Matt Davidson said FSWC "willfully misconstrued" OPIRG's actions, and he rejected the charge of anti-Semitism. "It is a shame that Mr. Benlolo would make these slanderous claims against OPIRG without even contacting us to learn what it is that we do."

Hubble was also part of a group of pro-Israel students who succeeded in reversing an anti-Israel policy of the Trent Central Student Association at the student group's annual general meeting Jan. 29.

The anti-Israel position that was reversed said that "co-operation, collaboration, or joint projects with Israeli academic and cultural institutions in any form… [should be prohibited] unless these institutions acknowledge Israel as an apartheid state."

According to StandWithUs Canada, students voted 47 for and 28 against to rescind the divestment motion.

Judy Zelikovitz, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' vice-president of university and local partner services, praised the students who succeeded in overturning the policy, which was adopted in February 2013.

"Their success demonstrates that BDS does not enjoy broad-based support on campus, and can be defeated with hard work and the right strategy," Zelikovitz said. ■

Montrealer takes over the reins at CIJA

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

David Cape, newly elected national chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), says he won't change course from the agenda set by outgoing chair David Koschitzky.

Cape, who began his term on Jan. 12, said he has great respect for Koschitzky's passion, dedication and effectiveness as a community leader, and plans to continue working toward "improving the quality of Jewish life in Canada by advancing the interests of Canadian Jewry."

Cape told The CJN he's laid out three objectives for his upcoming tenure: increase awareness of CIJA's work across the country; provide more meaningful opportunities for board members and lay leaders to directly engage in advocacy wherever CIJA works; and deepen CIJA's engagement across a range of platforms, including social policy, Israel and anti-Semitism.

Born and raised in Montreal, Cape, an alumnus of JPPS Elementary School and Bialik High School, says he felt compelled from an early age to contribute to the Jewish community and Israel.

"My father was very involved in our synagogue, as well as the YM-YWHA," Cape said, "and I learned that it was very important to give back to community when one was fortunate, as I was."

David Cape

Cape attended Princeton University from 1983 to 1987, and subsequently worked in the United States, first as the head of a software company and then as an employee at Microsoft, before moving back to Montreal in 1994.

Upon his return, he got involved with Federation CJA in Montreal. "It was [during this period], as I started visiting Israel during the intifadah that I again saw the commitment and effort Israelis were making to build the country under incredibly difficult circumstances and felt that I, too, needed to do my part and stand up for Israel."

In 2011, Cape became president of Federation CJA, a post he held until September 2013. During his term, Cape worked alongside CIJA to advocate on behalf of the local Jewish community during Quebec's contentious charter of values debate of 2013.

After stepping down as Federation CJA president, Cape was nominated to join CIJA's national board, an experience that he said allowed him to "witness first-hand how effective CIJA was at ensuring that the voice of the Jewish community was heard in discussions about issues important to Canadian Jewry, and how effective [CIJA] is at shaping the public policy debate."

Cape said he embraced his nomination to chair of the board, "sensing it would afford me the opportunity to contribute even more to efforts that strengthen our great community."

In addition to Israel advocacy, Cape said he's committed to furthering CIJA's engagement in several social justice issues, such as the campaign to protect Canadians from genetic discrimination.

"Canada remains the only G7 country without specific measures in place to prevent discrimination by employers or insurance companies based on genetic testing," Cape explained. "This has serious implications for diagnosing, treating and prevent an expanding array of diseases, particularly for Jews, given the prevalence of key genetic markers among Ashkenazim."

CIJA has also joined a coalition of civil society organizations supporting Bill C-279, which extends hate crimes protections to transgendered individuals, and is working to advance a private member's bill sponsored by Liberal MP Marc Garneau that would expand legal protections for Jewish institutions.

CIJA will remain involved in issues such as the ongoing debate over a Quebec charter of values, the upcoming elections in Israel and Canada, and immigration issues at the federal level.

"The Jewish community remains Canada's most frequent target of hate and bias-motivated crime at a rate ranging from 15 to 25 times than that of the overall population," Cape said.

"Given this experience, we have worked hard to ensure adequate protections are in place not just for our community, but for all Canadians." ■

Religious leaders and mayor unite to defend tolerance

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca MONTREAL

Christian, Muslim, Jewish and Sikh clerics joined Mayor Denis Coderre at Montreal City Hall on Jan. 28 in a show of solidarity that religiously and racially motivated violence and extremism are unacceptable.

Coderre was fulfilling a pledge he made at a Jewish community rally on Jan. 11 at Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation, held after the deadly terrorist attacks in Paris. He said at the time that he wanted to convene a meeting of local religious leaders in the belief that "we're all part of the solution" in protecting democratic freedoms.

Sixteen clerics spent about an hour sitting down with Coderre and six executive committee members, and they emerged to gather around the mayor at a press conference.

The rabbis participating were Reuben Poupko of Beth Israel Beth Aaron, Chaim Steinmetz of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem and David Banon, leader of the Centre sépharade de Torah de Laval and a rabbinical court judge.

There were four Muslim leaders: Sayed Nabil Abbas and Sheikh Nadim El Taki from the Shi'ite community, Sheikh Gilles Sadek of the Sunni community, and Sheikh Hassan Ezzeddine of the Druze community.

Among the Christian representatives was Most Reverend Christian Lépine, the Roman Catholic archbishop of Montreal.

Coderre said that in the wake of the murders at Charlie Hebdo and the Hyper Cacher supermarket in Paris, he felt it was his responsibility as mayor to take action in Montreal to ensure that harmony among the different religious communities is maintained.

His request to the clerics was that they take back to their communities the same message of peace and respect that they were conveying to the broader public on this day. "In the aftermath of the tragedies that took place in France… we want to present a united front and to denounce any act of hate. We do not want to import the problems of others here," Coderre said.

"The social contract of our city rests on the values of tolerance and respect for diversity, as well as peaceful coexistence among the different religions."

The meeting, he said, is the first step in what he hopes will become ongoing dialogue between the religious communities and the city administration and among themselves. A working committee has been set up to serve as a link between the communities and the city.

"Each of these leaders has a role to play in the fight we are leading against ignorance, violence and fanaticism. Thanks to them, the message of peace that we reiterated today can be transmitted within their different communities."

In comments to The CJN, Rabbi Poupko applauded Coderre for his initiative and said he has spoken "with great courage and clarity" against intolerance and on "the obligation of religious leaders to take a stand against extremism.

"He underscored the absolute need for religious leaders to bring this message within their communities."

Executive committee member Lionel Perez, who attended the meeting, said all communities must be vigilant in detecting radicalization among their members.

At the same time, he said Coderre is dedicated to maintaining an open and tolerant society. "The question is how to find the balance between the two." ■

NUSBAUM, EDITH ז"ל

The Yeshiva University family is deeply grieved by the passing of our longtime cherished friend, Edith Nusbaum of Toronto. Together with her beloved husband, Dr. Mark Nusbaum, a founding member of YU's Board of Overseers of the Azrieli Graduate School of Jewish Education and Administration, Edith was a YU Guardian and established generous scholarships for Canadian students pursuing graduate degrees at the Azrieli Graduate School. Edith Nusbaum was widely admired as an Ayshet Chayil – a veritable Woman of Valor who in all her ways was a partner in her family's business and a benevolent supporter for many worthy causes. Heartfelt condolences are extended to Dr. Mark Nusbaum and their children; Suzy (and Dr. Mark) Pomper, Shari (and Dan) Weil, Naomi (and Larry) Pinczower, Dr. Tammy (and Dr. Josh) Kruger, and many grandchildren and a great grandchild. Sister and sister-in-law of Dr. Tibor (Laya) Juda and Arthur Juda, z'l, Aaron and Bella, z'l Nussbaum, Dr. Charles and Elly Elbaum, and Maurice, z'l and Esther, z'l Boyman. KERZNER, JOSEPH ז"ל

The Yeshiva University family and the Board of Overseers of the Sy Syms School of Business as well as the affiliated Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University are profoundly bereaved by the passing of our partner and dynamic leader who as a YU Benefactor and as Vice Chair of the Sy Syms School of Business Board of Overseers established the Joseph Kerzner Chair in Accounting and was also a major contributor to the new MBA Program at the Sy Syms School. A devoted son, he established the Samuel Kerzner Memorial Scholarship and the Sarah Rivka Kerzner Memorial Scholarship in our undergraduate schools for men and women, respectively. He was a Yeshiva University's partner in helping Yeshiva University establish Dinners and Convocations in Toronto where on December 18, 1986 he received an honorary Doctorate from Yeshiva University in recognition of his selfless devotion to our institution and generous scholarship support under the auspices of the Bora Laskin Scholarship Fund established by Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University for deserving and needy Canadian students at Yeshiva University. He was honored again with the Pioneer Award at our most recent Convocation. Heartfelt condolences are extended to his beloved children: Jeff Kerzner and Cheryl and Ron Pancer, dear brother and brother-in-law of Gertie and the late Walter Gangel, z'l, Anne Zaretsky, Lou and Helen Kerzner, Max and Dolly Kerzner, Albert and Anita Kerzner, Miriam and the late Morris Kerzner, z'l, doting grandfather and an especially cherished uncle of Michael Kerzner who was extremely devoted to him along with many other family members. May the entire family be comforted among the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

GUEST VOICE

Debt, fear, lack of self-worth remain after marital abuse

Talia Silver*

When I was in my early 20s, I was introduced to a chassidic man who was six years older. After a brief courtship, we were married. Over the six years of our marriage, I gave birth to three children. He did not provide financially for our family and we had to relocate often. We lived intermittently with my parents as well as with his parents. I put our food bills on my credit card and I accumulated significant debt.

He would stay up all night and sleep all day. He never pursued any kind of steady employment. In the evening, he would hurriedly pray so that he could go out with his friends and/or attend an undisclosed meeting. He was not transparent with any details because he believed that women do not have the capacity to understand such matters.

From the onset of our marriage, there were numerous problems. My husband would relentlessly scream at me in an extremely threatening and demeaning tone: "Where's my shirt? Why didn't you iron my shirt? If you love me, then you would do this for me and have my clothes ready for me to wear. This is not the way we do things!" He had constant tantrums and would regularly humiliate me in the presence of others, including my parents.

If something was not done to his unattainable and unpredictable standards, he would glare at me intensely and accuse me of not loving him. He was extraordinarily manipulative, constantly placing the onus for his abuse on me. For instance, he would hostilely question me for hours to the point that I would succumb as a result of overwhelming mental duress.

Other examples of his abusive behaviour to me:

- When I unintentionally dropped a meat spoon on a milk surface, he became enraged and threw the food I prepared into the garbage in front of all of the guests, leaving me mortified.
- He threw my challah dough in the garbage in front of my in-laws because I had failed to follow his precise instructions.
- He screamed and insulted me in front of my children, family and friends. I was extremely worried that my children would grow up disrespecting me because of the behaviour modelled for them.
- He would physically block the doorway to unremittingly taunt me in the presence of our children.
- When one of our young children misbehaved he would take them outside, regardless of the weather, and not allow them into the home until the child agreed to stop crying. I vehemently objected to this severe method of discipline, but he would threaten me and prevent me from protecting our children.
- He isolated me from friends and supporters.

I began to see a therapist, and during these sessions, I recognized that I was a victim of verbal, emotional and psychological abuse. I told my husband that he must go and seek therapy if he wanted our marriage to continue. He denied any ownership of our marital issues. My husband went for five therapy sessions, but stopped without telling me. When I found out he was no longer interested in pursuing therapy, I came to the realization that he was not serious about repairing our marriage.

We have lived in separate countries for the past two years. I asked for a get several months ago and he has consistently refused. During our time apart, he has barely contacted his children. For a while, I called him daily so that the children could have contact with him. It went to voicemail or, if he picked up, he would scream at me for bothering him.

I informed my husband of an upcoming celebration for our son, hoping he would attend. He told me that if it took place without his permission, he would hire the most expensive lawyers and make me pay compensation for years. He also threatened to call the police and tell them that I kidnapped his children, and he said he would run away, making me an agunah, a woman who has not received a get (a religious divorce) and can therefore not remarry, for 60 years.

I now live in fear for my children's safety and welfare as well as my own. Additionally, I feel the need to act quickly to prevent myself from ending up an agunah.

I now accept that my husband will likely never change. For most of our marriage, I was harshly berated for menial and trivial matters. I refuse to raise my children in such an unhealthy and unstable environment. I have gone back to school to learn a profession to support my children and myself. My parents continue to support me and my children financially and emotionally. ■

Better laws needed to protect women: experts

Sasson said there should be better laws in place to protect women.

"We know that even if a woman has a restraining order… it doesn't mean that he's not going to hurt her. I think there are a lot of areas that need continuous lobbying, and we also have to be vigilant because things fall through the cracks very quickly. And so we have to make sure that the government is keeping up with their promises and changes that are required. It's not only about getting better, it's protecting what we've already accomplished," Sasson said.

"We go backwards a lot, government-wise. Women's issues aren't in the portfolio for the government any more. We've been filtered into general services. I think we lose a lot and we have to keep fighting to keep it."

Krowitz said that in the 25 years she's been at the helm of ATEVAW, there has been some progress, but not enough.

"We live in a world that celebrates violence," she said, referring to the highest grossing films, television shows and video games.

"I think what has happened to society is that it has become desensitized to violence. We live in a disrespectful society in many ways.

"We need a seismic shift in our culture in order for an issue like this to go away." ■

SeeJN | Names, not numbers

Netivot HaTorah Day School Grade 8 student Ethan Rennert interviews Holocaust survivor Leon Rucker on Jan. 23, as part of Names, Not Numbers, an oral history project that brings students face-to-face with Holocaust survivors. Netivot is participating in the project for the fifth time. The curriculum includes interviewing survivors and filming them as they tell their personal and emotional stories of survival. The students work with a Holocaust educator, a Jewish studies teacher, a journalist and a filmmaker to produce a documentary film that will premiere in June.

New Nova Scotia-Israel R&D program announced

JOEL JACOBSON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A new program to facilitate research and development partnerships between entrepreneurs and firms in Nova Scotia and Israel was announced Feb. 2 in Israel, Ottawa and Halifax.

The program aims to build stronger innovation and economic bridges between the province and Israel. It was initiated last November when Israeli Ambassador Rafael Barak met with Nova Scotia Premier Stephen McNeil in Halifax.

The joint program brings together the Israeli Office of the Chief Scientist in the Ministry of Economy and the province of Nova Scotia through the Israeli Industry Center for R&D (MATIMOP), the Canada-Israel Industrial Research Development Foundation (CIIRDF), and the Embassy of Israel in Canada.

Called the Nova Scotia-Israel Innovation Program (NSIIP), the program will harness the complementary R&D expertise, experience and resources of both regions. The NSIIP will leverage investment from the Office of the Chief Scientist (OCS), Ministry of Economy in Israel; and the province of Nova Scotia through Innovacorp.

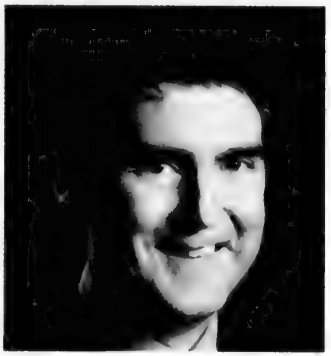
The program will enhance R&D partnership between Israel and Nova Scotia, and promote the joint creation and commercialization of high potential technologies in which collaborations between their start-ups could accelerate growth toward full scale operations and commercial success. Entrepreneurs will be able to combine their technological and business capabilities, and address key challenges during the precarious start-up phase of development, reducing the risk of new ventures while developing new channels to global markets.

Barak reflected on the close ties between Israel and Nova Scotia, beginning with David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, who trained as a young soldier at Fort Edward in Nova Scotia during World War I.

"We have recently strengthened these ties with several collaborative projects between Dalhousie University and Ben-Gurion University. Today's announcement takes our bilateral relationship to the next level with a partnership in innovation that will open up new economic opportunities and foster even closer people-to-people connections."

McNeil added, "We're pleased to create a more formal collaboration between the vibrant technology start-up communities in Nova Scotia and Israel. This partnership will allow early-stage Nova Scotia companies to accelerate their growth through improved access to technology, global markets, business expertise and investment."

Henri Rothschild, president of CIIRDF, stated: "CIIRDF was founded on a powerful vision: science and technology partnerships are major engines of economic growth, and deliver significant return on investment to all collaborators. The Nova Scotia-Israel Innovation Program will deliver on this value proposition and enrich companies in both jurisdictions. With a sharp focus on regional economic objectives, it will stimulate the development of novel products, open-up new global markets for collaborating firms, and ultimately increase the global competitiveness of Nova Scotia and Israel."



Stephen McNeil

Rafael Barak

The role of Innovacorp, Nova Scotia's early-stage venture capital organization, is to find, fund and foster innovative Nova Scotia start-ups that strive to change the world. To kick-start the program, MATIMOP and CIIRDF will work closely with companies across Nova Scotia, including firms in Innovacorp's portfolio, to identify key technological and business needs in Nova Scotia that could be addressed by Israeli companies and start-ups.

Parties will jointly facilitate matchmaking and broker new collaborations, as well as conduct bilateral calls for research and development proposals. Where possible, there will be co-funding of selected R&D projects by the OCS in Israel and Innovacorp in Nova Scotia. These initiatives will provide Nova Scotia and Israeli firms with a greater understanding of the technological strengths of each jurisdiction, business synergies, and long-term opportunities for R&D collaboration. ■

Cotler to receive Law Society's first Human Rights Award

plungen@thecjn.ca

You can add the Law Society of Upper Canada's first-ever Human Rights Award to the list of honours bestowed on Montreal MP Irwin Cotler.

Cotler, a professor of law and former minister of justice and attorney general of Canada, will receive the inaugural award at a special evening on Feb. 12 at Osgoode Hall in downtown Toronto.

The award will be granted every two years to recipients for their "outstanding contributions to the advancement of human rights and/or the promotion of the rule of law provincially, nationally or internationally," states a Law Society news release.

"The Law Society is committed to the protection of human rights and the rule of law and we are extremely pleased to present our very first Human Rights Award to the Honourable Irwin Cotler," said Law Society treasurer Janet Minor. "His long and illustrious career as an outspoken advocate for human rights – both at home and abroad – makes him a most fitting recipient."

As federal minister of justice from 2003 to 2006, Cotler launched the National Justice Initiative Against Racism and Hate and initiated the first prosecution in Canada under the Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Act for incitement to genocide in Rwanda.

Prior to entering politics, Cotler worked as an international human rights lawyer, representing such high-profile clients as Soviet dissidents Andrei Sakharov and Natan Sharansky, South Africa's Nelson Mandela, and Jacobo Timmerman in Latin America.

He is part of the international legal team representing two Chinese political prisoners, 2011 Nobel Peace Prize laureate Liu Xiaobo and Gao Zhisheng.

As justice minister, he brought together the justice ministers of Egypt, Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian Authority to participate in the first-ever joint justice forum.

A constitutional and comparative law expert, he has testified before parliamentary committees on human rights in Canada, the United States, Russia, Sweden, Norway and Israel.

Cotler has received 10 honorary doctorate degrees and numerous awards.

The ceremony bestowing the Law Society's award will take place from 4:30 to 5:30 p.m. in Osgoode Hall's Donald Lamont Learning Centre, with a reception to follow.

The public event is free though participants are asked to RSVP in advance.

Cotler, 74, is known as a staunch defender of Israel. He has been MP for Mount Royal since 1999, but said last year that he will not be running in the next federal election, which is expected to be held next fall. ■

FSWC announces new post-graduate scholarship

jshupac@thecjn.ca

From left, Liel Miron-Halyo, Lisa Xiao and Nathan Gibson FRIENDS OF SIMON WIESENTHAL CENTER PHOTO

In an effort to counter Holocaust denial and encourage the academic study of the Shoah, the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) has partnered with charitable organization the Zaglembier Society to establish a new, post-graduate-level scholarship.

The FSWC-Zaglembier Society Scholarship will award $1,800 apiece annually for a trial period of five years to two students focusing on Holocaust studies within a post-graduate program in the 2015-2016 academic year.

"We hope the scholarship will... support the continuation of Holocaust studies among the young people of the community," said Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of FSWC.

"The Holocaust is a singular event in human history that should and cannot be forgotten... Its lessons must be passed on to future generations in the hope that humanity will learn from them."

David Bleeman, president of The Zaglembier Society, whose membership mainly consists of Holocaust survivors and children of survivors from the Polish province of Zaglembie, said the organization believes "it is our obligation to ensure the phrase 'never forget' is grounded in rigorous academic study."

While few graduate programs in Canada focus exclusively on the Holocaust, Benlolo said the subject is often included in Jewish studies, history and genocide and human rights programs, and graduate students exploring the subject in their given field are eligible to apply.

He stressed that the scholarship is non-denominational, and that applicants needn't be Jewish. Both FSWC and the Zaglembier Society recognize the importance of students of varying faiths and backgrounds pursuing Holocaust studies in their post-graduate work, Benlolo said, to ensure that "the horrific truth of what really happened isn't distorted or forgotten."

He added: "FSWC believes the legacy and lessons of the Holocaust are not only for the Jewish community, and provide critical learning for all people."

The scholarship will complement FSWC's existing Wiesenthal Scholarships. Seven awards worth $3,600 each are given annually to graduating high school students on a university track who have demonstrated what Benlolo called "initiative and leadership in carrying out [the late Nazi hunter] Simon Wiesenthal's legacy of tolerance, justice and human rights within their schools and communities."

FSWC also plans to launch a third scholarship program this spring, providing seed money to high school students interested in starting up initiatives consistent with the organization's mission to counter hate and intolerance in the community.

FSWC is already involved with university campuses in various capacities through the Wiesenthal Campus Initiative, in which a national campus co-ordinator works with both undergraduate and graduate students from campuses across Canada to promote FSWC's message of tolerance, co-existence, dialogue and education.

The organization also works with FSWC student ambassadors to co-ordinate speaking events and programs on campus that address issues such as race, religion, hate and multiculturalism.

This past semester, for example, the organization arranged for Sudanese human rights activist Simon Deng to share his story of overcoming child slavery with students at Ryerson University and the University of Toronto.

"The student ambassadors monitor their campuses for acts of racism, intolerance and anti-Semitism," Benlolo explained, "and maintain contact with our national campus co-ordinator on how to effectively address these cases of intolerance."

Applicants to the FSWC-Zaglembier Society Scholarship will be assessed based on their academic merit at the undergraduate level, their proposed thesis topics and a written application addressing questions related to their goals within Holocaust education and their reasons for pursuing Holocaust studies at the post-graduate level.

The application process hasn't officially opened, but Benlolo said some university students have already started to hear about the scholarship via word of mouth, and have expressed interest in applying. ■

New Windsor JCC head comes home to lead community

RON STANG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, WINDSOR, ONT

Jay Katz

Jay Katz is coming home.

Katz, who grew up in Windsor but in recent years has been Toronto-based, takes the helm at the Windsor Jewish Community Centre this spring.

In fact, Katz said, this will be the "third time I'm moving to Windsor in my life."

The Toronto native first moved to Windsor as a child when he was seven, growing up here and leaving at 22. He returned in the 1990s and was hired as executive director of the Windsor Symphony Orchestra, leaving in 2007 for the same post with the Edmonton Symphony Orchestra.

Katz has an MBA from the University of Western Ontario, and has worked widely in finance and real estate in both Canada and the United States. But he also was an antique dealer in Los Angeles and has had extensive experience in arts and non-profit management.

He's excited about returning to Windsor.

"It's a community that is close to my heart," he said. "I grew up there. It means a lot to me. It's a great opportunity to do something meaningful and interesting."

Katz lauds the city's diversity – it's the fourth-most ethnically diverse in Canada – and the "lifestyle" of a moderate climate and little congestion. He still has a brother and cousins here.

Outgoing community centre director Harvey Kessler is retiring after 15 years.

Kessler, a Windsor native, has had a wide background in the non-profit sector including with the Canadian Hearing Society and the United Way.

Kessler is looking forward to travelling to Israel with wife, Marcia, to spend more time with immediate family.

"Windsor is the smallest organized Jewish community in Canada," Kessler said. Besides the community centre, there is also the I.L. Peretz House 70-unit senior citizens apartment building.

The Jewish community is notably well integrated with the overall population.

For example, Peretz House is open to all – "only around 15 to 20 per cent of our tenants are Jewish," Kessler said.

As well, during summer, the federation sponsors Camp Yomee, where 150 children from the entire community attend.

For over a decade, the community centre has also organized the Windsor Jewish Film Festival, "attracting well over a thousand people now," Kessler said.

There's also the annual student forum on social justice, which brings together 150 Grade 8 students for workshops on everything from lessons learned from the Holocaust to poverty and homelessness.

"That's open to all," he said.

The Windsor area has some 1,500 Jewish residents, a number that Kessler said remains "stable."

Katz will take the torch from Kessler in another way as well.

"Prior to myself, all the executive directors here had been Americans," Kessler said. "And I was the first kind of local Windsor boy who took the position. Now, Jay is the second Windsor boy to take it." ■

Little being done to fix U.S.-Israel rift

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

The Netanyahu government and the Obama administration have had no shortage of spats over the years, but this time around, neither Jerusalem nor Washington is reportedly doing much to fix the rifts that emerged surrounding Israel's prime minister's planned March 3 speech to the U.S. Congress on Iran, a visit American officials said breached protocol as it was not co-ordinated with the White House.

According to a Jan. 31 report in the New York Times the current row reflects "six years of suspicion and mistrust and grievance, wounds from past brawls easily reopened by what might otherwise be small irritations."

"It reflects resentment on the part of [Barack] Obama, who watched [Benjamin]Netanyahu seemingly root for his Republican opponent in the 2012 election and now sees him circumventing the Oval Office to work with a Republican Congress instead. And it reflects a conviction on the part of Netanyahu that Obama may sell out Israel with a bad deal and may be trying to influence the coming Israeli elections," set to take place March 17, two weeks after his planned speech.

Netanyahu is widely expected to urge American lawmakers to pass a new sanctions bill against Iran to force to it comply with international demands it curb its nuclear program – a bill Obama strongly opposes and has vowed to veto, urging that such a move would hinder the P5+1 negotiations under way to secure a deal with Tehran. Officials in Jerusalem said last week, however, that Netanyahu would focus less on sanctions and more on the dangers of a bad deal with Iran.

The row over the planned Congress speech has set off an ugly, ongoing public spat between the Netanyahu government and the Obama administration, with senior American officials charging that the Israeli leader had "spat" in Obama's face and could not be trusted.

On Jan. 30, Israel's ambassador to the U.S., Ron Dermer, insisted that Netanyahu's decision to accept the invitation by Republican House Speaker John Boehner was not meant to disrespect Obama.

Officials in the Netanyahu government told Israeli media late last week that the United States has already agreed in principle to a deal that would leave Iran capable of enriching enough uranium for a nuclear bomb within "mere months." A Channel 10 report quoted unnamed Jerusalem sources saying the terms of the deal would leave Iran "closer than was thought" to nuclear weapons, "mere months from producing enough material for a bomb," and that the U.S. has agreed to 80 per cent of Iran's demands.

The fallout from the row may result in a "virtual freeze in the relationship at the very top until after the 2016 American presidential vote," according to the New York Times.

Richard Haass, a former U.S. State Department official and president of the Council of Foreign Relations, told the paper that it seemed Netanyahu and his government has "written off" the Obama administration, placing all their bets on the Republicans. "They have made the calculation that to the extent possible, they will use Congress as the channel to conduct their relationship," he said.

Netanyahu on Jan.30 downplayed the diplomatic spat, terming it a "procedural issue" that can be resolved – unlike a "bad" deal with Tehran, which cannot be so easily mended. "We can resolve procedural issues with regard to my appearance in the U.S., but if Iran arms itself with nuclear weapons, it will be a lot harder to fix," Netanyahu said.

Last week, a senior Obama administration official charged that Dermer has been working to advance the political fortunes of Netanyahu at the expense of the U.S.-Israel relationship, according to the New York Times. The accusation marked a striking escalation in the rhetorical spat between the White House and the Netanyahu government over the Congress speech.

The "unusually sharp criticism" by the senior official, who was not named in the report, reflected "the outrage the episode has incited within President Obama's inner circle," the Times suggested. "Such officially authorized criticisms of diplomats from major allies are unusual." ■

One of two IDF soldiers killed in last week's Hezbollah missile attack on the Lebanon border, Staff Sgt. Dor Haim Nini, 20, from Shtulim, was laid to rest in the cemetery of his home village on Jan. 29. Limor Avizard, Nini's cousin, said that Dor "was a king, an Israeli hero. He got through Operation Protective Edge bravely." Dror Shor, the head of the Be'er Tuviya Regional Council where Shtulim is located, said Nini's family was one of the oldest in the moshav and that the death of Dor, "a wonderful boy," is "a disaster that is hard to describe."

Pirates, hippies and anti-porn crusader vie for votes in upcoming election

LAZAR BERMAN
JERUSALEM

As the deadline for registering with the Central Elections Committee passed Jan. 29, the Israeli election season kicked into high gear, with 26 parties jostling for the Knesset's 120 seats.

Mainstream parties such as Likud, Zionist Camp and the ultra-Orthodox factions registered for the March 17 elections, as did a host of newcomers. Former Shas leader Eli Yishai settled on the new name Yachad – Hebrew for "Together" – for his new faction, after toying with the name Ha'am Itanu.

Haredi women's party U'Bezchutan, formed to protest the exclusion of women on ultra-Orthodox lists, also registered.

Among other newbies, the united Arab party, the Joint List – made up of the Hadash, Ra'am, Ta'al and Balad parties – is projected to win around 12 seats in the elections. Moshe Kahlon's new party, Kulanu, is polling around nine seats.

The Pirates party registered for the second straight election. The one-man Protecting Our Children – Stop Feeding Them Porno party is also vying for a spot. The hippie-chassidic Breslaver We Are All Friends (Kulanu Chaverim) Na Nach party also threw its black hat into the ring.

The Green party went with a vulgar phrase meaning, "We just don't care" for its faction name.

In a surprise move, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu named Benny Begin to the 11th slot on the Likud list.

Begin, a respected former minister and son of the first Likud prime minister, Menachem Begin, lost his Knesset seat after failing to win a sufficiently high slot on the 2013 Likud slate, and did not compete in the party primaries this time. ■

OPINION

Canada, the ICC and Argentina – correcting injustice

Gerald Steinberg

If there is a justification for the International Criminal Court (ICC), it is the case of Alberto Nisman, the Argentine prosecutor murdered on Jan. 18. After years of official cover-up and delay, Nisman became the central investigator of the horrific 1994 bombing of the Buenos Aires Jewish Community Centre, which killed 85 and injured 300. He was killed (the government first claimed this as a suicide) the night before he was scheduled to expose the top officials in Argentina who covered up the role of senior Iranians in the bombing.

For 20 years, Argentina's legal and court systems demonstrated that they are incapable of bringing the perpetrators to justice. The murder of Nisman highlights this fact. And it is precisely for cases like this that the ICC was designed – for "crimes against humanity" in situations where national courts are unwilling or unable to prosecute the perpetrators. The victims and families have no other place to turn in their quest for justice.

An ICC investigation can be initiated by a signatory government ("state party"), and Canada is a very appropriate candidate to demand that the prosecutor act without further delay. Canada played a key role in the negotiation of the Rome Statute that created the court in the late 1990s, under the Liberal government headed by Jean Chrétien. Indeed, the website of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Trade and Development still boasts that "Canadians can be proud of the central role Canada played in establishing the International Criminal Court (ICC)."

This role included chairing negotiating committees, extensive lobbying and even funding "non-governmental organizations (NGOs) from developing nations so that the ICC process would benefit from their unique perspectives."

However, as critics predicted, much of this well-intentioned activity was naive, and like other international organizations, the ICC framework has been very limited and quickly politicized. Only nine official investigations have been conducted, all concerning Africans. Two individuals have been convicted and a number of cases were dismissed or withdrawn. There is no evidence that the deterrent effect expected from the creation of the ICC has developed – mass terror, war crimes and crimes against humanity continue unabated.

A Canadian-led ICC investigation and prosecution of the perpetrators of the 1994 Buenos Aires mass terror attack (the evidence overwhelmingly points to Iran and its Hezbollah allies) and the murder of Alberto Nisman would reverse this trend. It would show that state sponsors of mass terror, such as Iran, do not have immunity, even when political leaders in terror sites such as Argentina are readily corrupted.

In addition, Canada's request to the ICC prosecutor would also be an important moral and ethical antidote to the intense campaign to exploit the ICC for anti-Israel legal warfare. In his recent visit to Israel, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird denounced the Palestinian-led ICC campaign against Israel and the decision to open a preliminary investigation.

As Baird understood, one of the main objectives is to restrict Israel's ability to defend its citizens – a result that is the opposite of the ICC's stated purpose of promoting justice. "Israel – every time it comes under attack – seems to have to have one hand tied behind its back. And what this seems to do is tie the other hand behind its back."

Baird also noted that "obviously, Israel has one of the most independent judiciaries in the world," which should rule out any ICC involvement. Under Baird's instructions, Canada is filing an objection: "We are going to speak out forcefully against this decision, and try to get it turned around."

Given this background, a Canadian-led demand that the ICC immediately investigate and prosecute the perpetrators of the 1994 Buenos Aires bombing and the 2015 murder of Alberto Nisman would indeed fulfil the court's purpose. After 20 years, the victims and their families would finally see some hope that justice will be done. ■

'Bottlegate' affair against Netanyahus heats up

LAZAR BERMAN
JERUSALEM

Israel's attorney general asked the state comptroller to share with him the results of ongoing investigation into allegations of excessive expenditures and possible misappropriation of state funds by the Netanyahu family.

According to the Justice Ministry, Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein held a meeting about the allegations on Feb. 1, after which he released a letter to State Comptroller Yosef Shapira, asking him to "transfer to me all the material you have gathered" on the issue.

"Though your investigation into the matters mentioned in the letter has not yet finished, I would be grateful if you update me on the issue," the letter read.

Weinstein also asked Shapira for an indication as to when the comptroller's report on the allegations would be released.

In June 2014, the attorney general had asked Shapira to look into charges that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's wife, Sara, pocketed thousands of shekels in returns on bottles recycled by the prime minister's residence.

Earlier Sunday, Shapira revealed he would not delay the release of his report because of election day on March 17.

The Netanyahus' attorney David Shimron confirmed he had requested a delay, because he argued the report should either compare the Netanyahu era with those of other prime ministers, or compare his spending with that of other top officials such as the president.

The report goes beyond the recycled-bottles controversy and examines spending on luxuries in the premier's residence on items such as flower arrangements, scented candles and catering.

Since drinks consumed in the prime minister's residence are purchased by the state, any funds accruing from them belong, by law, to the state treasury.

The Netanyahus said the funds were collected by them inadvertently, and noted that some 4,000 shekels ($1,300 Cdn) was returned to the state coffers in 2013 by Sara Netanyahu under the supervision of the financial regulator of the Prime Minister's Office.

The so-called "bottlegate" accusations, which surfaced in recent weeks in a lawsuit by a former employee of the prime minister's residence, have been taken up by the election campaigns of parties hoping to oust Netanyahu.

Statements from the prime minister in recent days accused left-wing parties of engaging in "personal" attacks against his family instead of substantive debate.

Tzipi Livni, head of Hatnua and co-leader of the Labor party-led Zionist Camp Knesset slate, charged over the weekend that the Prime Minister's Office under Netanyahu consumed some 4,300 shekels ($1,400) worth of alcohol each month. ■

A look back at how Auschwitz was reported – or not

JULIE WIENER
JTA, NEW YORK

Hundreds of Holocaust survivors and foreign dignitaries journeyed to Auschwitz last week to mark the 70th anniversary of the notorious Nazi death camp's liberation. And media outlets from all over the world were there to document the trip.

Auschwitz today is the most potent symbol of the Holocaust. But at the time the camp was liberated – on Jan. 27, 1945, by the Red Army – there was virtually no press coverage.

In fact, while both JTA and the New York Times had written about Auschwitz on multiple occasions in 1944, neither mentioned the death camp again until months after its liberation.

JTA's first post-liberation reference to Auschwitz came on June 30, 1945, in a short article about 2,000 survivors "from such infamous places as Dachau, Buchenwald, Auschwitz and Mauthausen" travelling to Tyrol, in western Austria, in hopes of immigrating to Palestine, Brazil, the United States and France.

Perhaps in the months and years after the war, Auschwitz's liberation – and the grim scene found there by the Red Army soldiers – was eclipsed by other war-related news, particularly as the Jewish community became absorbed with the project of resettling hundreds of thousands displaced people and building a Jewish state. Or perhaps it was too horrifying and painful to address so soon. Certainly, it cannot be explained by the ignorance of Auschwitz's horrors, since the 1944 reports offered a fairly clear picture of what was happening inside the electrical fences.

The train tracks leading to the goods station in Auschwitz. Auschwitz was the largest of the German concentration camps. ISAAC HARARI/FLASH90

A June 1944 report by the World Council of Churches in Geneva, for example, noted "that travel conditions are such that many deportees die en route and that others are killed and cremated on arrival in Auschwitz."

A few days later, JTA reported on more details, including the practice of tattooing inmates and the failure to provide adequate clothing.

In November, the United States War Refugee Board offered still more details, based on eyewitness reports from two prisoners who had escaped Auschwitz and Birkenau, and of a "non-Jewish Polish army major who is the sole survivor of one group imprisoned at Auschwitz."

The War Refugee Board report, as described by JTA, said that those caught trying to escape Auschwitz "were hanged in the presence of the whole camp," described the "brutal" working conditions and told of the camp's "biological laboratory" where "SS, civilian and internee doctors performed 'experiments' on Jewish girls and women."

Whatever the reasons, it took several years for anyone to commemorate the anniversary of liberation – or at least for any such commemoration to garner media coverage.

The first one on which JTA reported came in 1951, with 50,000 people at an Auschwitz ceremony mentioned in a larger article about other commemorations in Europe, including one for the eighth anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. At that early Auschwitz liberation ceremony organized by the Polish government and delegations from Czechoslovakia and Hungary, JTA noted that "only a handful of Jews... were reported present."

It was not until liberation's 50th anniversary, in 1995, that it began receiving significant attention, no doubt aided by the fall of the Iron Curtain, which made it easier for visitors to travel to Poland.

Not all the attention was positive. As JTA reported, the two days of 50th anniversary commemorations were "marked by conflicts between Jews and Poles as to how Auschwitz should be remembered."

Conflicting understandings of the Holocaust spurred Jews to stage "their own separate memorial ceremony on Jan. 26 in 1995 as a supplement to the official program."

By the 60th anniversary in 2005, when JTA published a series of articles and the ceremony at Auschwitz attracted 1,000 survivors and more than 40 heads of state, Polish-Jewish relations had improved.

Some 1.3 million people died in Auschwitz, about one million of them Jews. What will happen at the next major anniversary, in 2025? One thing we know for certain: at the 80th anniversary, the youngest remaining survivors will be over 90, meaning it may very well be the last ceremony in which any witnesses are present. ■

Holocaust documentary broadcast to Iranians

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

A documentary film featuring footage from the Auschwitz death camp has been broadcast to Iranian viewers, exposing many of them for the first time to the atrocities and mass-murder committed by the Nazis against the Jews.

The documentary, titled Germany's Führer, was broadcast on Holocaust Memorial Day by Manoto1, a London-based satellite TV station, and was shot by an Iranian film crew that visited the site. The film details the Nazis rise to power in Europe and discusses the stages leading up to the execution of the Final Solution for the extermination of the Jews.

The showing of the film coincided with International Holocaust Memorial Day and marked 70 years since the camp was finally liberated by the Soviet army.

Owning a satellite dish in the Islamic Republic is forbidden by the government, but nevertheless, the documentary was estimated to have been viewed by scores of Iranians.

It is unclear to what extent the film actually managed to change the deeply rooted opinions of many Iranians who maintain the Holocaust was fabricated or perpetrated by the Jewish People as a means to garner world sympathy.

"All these crimes were committed by the Jews themselves so they reach their real objectives," one viewer wrote on Facebook, according to the Times of London.

Yet the screening of the film did succeed in sparking a lively online debate in Iran, leading some to draw parallels between the Nazis and their leader Adolf Hitler, and the heads of the Islamic Republic.

"We are being trampled under the boots of the likes of Hitler today. At least Hitler wanted to improve the lives of his own people, but these people ruling Iran today want everything for themselves," the Times reported one viewer as writing.

Holocaust denial is widespread in Iran and the position has often been reinforced by the country's leaders, most notably former president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who referred to the Holocaust as "pure fiction."

However, Iran's current president, Hassan Rouhani, has publicly acknowledged the Holocaust.

"Any crime that happens in history against humanity, including the crime the Nazis committed towards the Jews as well as non-Jews, was reprehensible and to be condemned," Rouhani told CNN in September 2013. ■

Marathon runs around in circles

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

An actor or dancer has a lot to remember when he or she struts onto a stage during a performance. An actor does not just have to remember the lines, but the emotional inflection behind the dialogue, as well as the staging. A dancer has to think about proper form and sharing the space beyond just getting the moves right.

Now, imagine that the performer's role was to move, speak and interact with the other actors – but had to do so while running around a circular space, mostly without stopping, for a full hour.

This is the major challenge behind staging Marathon, an acclaimed Israeli play that arrives at the Theatre Centre in Toronto on Feb. 4 before a short nationwide tour. The Canadian staging will mark Marathon's English-language and North American premiere.

Choreographer Aharona Israel, also the play's creator, says the constant physical exertion inherent to the performance is a metaphor for Israeli society. The constant running in a circle reflects a state of urgency, emergency and, ultimately, exhaustion.

"It is also a way to search for authenticity on stage," Israel tells The CJN, adding that the actors will not fake their exhaustion after running for so long.

Marathon pushes its performers to their physical limits. Due to the rigorous demands of the performance, it took Israel and her actors half a year of rehearsal before they were ready to stage Marathon in 2012. She hired a running coach to teach the actors how to maintain energy during that process.

Marathon's text and characters, meanwhile, derive from the experiences of the three actors. The current staging and text cover topics such as immigration, bereavement and post-war trauma.

Maus creator discusses art of cartoons

RON CSILLAG

Art Spiegelman ENNO KAPITZA PHOTO

Art Spiegelman was exhausted – he had just returned from China. The condition, he conceded apologetically, caused him to be a bit rambling and unedited. But the beneficiary was a packed audience Jan. 26 at the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema.

The storied cartoonist and creator of Maus, now lauded as a touchstone in both the "graphic novel" genre as well as in Holocaust education, took the crowd through a freewheeling, hour-long appreciation of comics, free speech, his Jewish sensibilities and, in the wake of the Charlie Hebdo massacres, how perilous a craft cartooning can be.

Drawing chuckles, Spiegelman said he's been called the father of the graphic novel, "but I'm demanding a blood test."

Mainly, he dwelled on the topic of his talk, presented by the Koffler Centre of the Arts: "What the %&@! Happened to Comics?" Whether political, journalistic or just fun, comics and cartooning (not the same things, he stressed) have lost their bite and whimsy, at least in North America, he claimed.

That's a pity, he added, because humans, Spiegelman believes, are hardwired to think in comic-like panels of single images and "in little bursts of language."

Now 66, Spiegelman recounted growing up in New York on a steady diet of comic books. He learned to read from Batman, philosophy from Peanuts, politics from Pogo and about sex by contemplating Betty and Veronica of Archie fame. "Everything else" came from Mad magazine, which, in its earliest incarnations, was widely denounced as crude and subversive.

"I studied Mad the way some kids studied the Talmud," he quipped. "It changed my life. It made me want to be a cartoonist." To him, Mad, which was written mainly by Jews, "was my window into America from a dysfunctional refugee household" and "a secular Jewish response to Auschwitz."

His Polish Holocaust survivor parents, however, "didn't see it that way."

As is well known by now, Spiegelman's crowning achievement was Maus, a monumental, stirring and hugely innovative story, told in cartoon form, of his parents' survival of the Nazi era and their later lives in America. Famously, Jews are depicted as mice, Germans as cats, Americans as dogs and Poles as pigs. Maus was the first graphic novel to win a Pulitzer Prize in 1992 and is widely used as a teaching tool.

Spiegelman explained briefly how his animal representations came to be. Partly, they were a result of the standard cat versus mouse food chain in comics and cartoons, but he also built on earlier anti-Semitic depictions of Jews as rodents.

With overhead photos and reproductions, he showed images from the Nazi newspaper Der Sturmer and several anti-Semitic cartoons depicting Jews as unclean rats infecting the German body politic. The intent was to dehumanize Jews. "It's necessary to dehumanize in order to kill," Spiegelman said, "and it was no accident that Zyklon B (used in gas chambers) was a pesticide."

Post-Maus, Spiegelman felt he had to re-invent himself, so he went to work for the New Yorker, where his first cover art, in 1993, showed a chassidic man in a deep embrace and kiss with a black woman. It was meant to convey conciliation in the raw weeks following the riots in Crown Heights between Jews and African-Americans, "but all hell broke loose," Spiegelman recalled. "Everybody was upset by it."

He redeemed himself somewhat with a post-9/11 cover that appeared as funereal all-black but which actually showed the twin towers when viewed at a certain angle.

As for Charlie Hebdo, Spiegelman claimed the French satirical newspaper is not anti-Islamic but an offender of all religions, including the Catholic Church. He likened it to the television cartoon South Park, and though juvenile, "it relishes the ability to speak its mind, whether that's good or bad."

He showed a variety of covers from the publication, and also the infamous 2006 Danish editorial cartoons of Muhammad that generated global controversy.

Though he never wanted to be a political cartoonist, Spiegelman waded into the fray himself in the wake of a contest a few years ago in Iran for best anti-Semitic cartoon. Published in the New Yorker, Spiegelman's efforts succeeded as satire because they held Iran's contest in contempt.

Ultimately, he said, political cartoons have lost their "sting" in America because of declining newspaper readership coupled with the fear of offending. ■

The Art Gallery of Ontario continues its exhibit of Spiegelman's work. Art Spiegelman's CO-MIX: A Retrospective runs to March 14.

Historical novel takes place in Inquistion-era Portugal

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The plot of David Liss' latest novel, The Day of Atonement, centres upon a nearly impossible, usually unreachable, human task.

"I needed to restore order to my broken life," explains Sebastian Foxx, the audacious, troubled, courageous hero of the story. Foxx's life was broken, we learn in the first pages of the book, by the Inquisition in Portugal.

Some 10 years before the main narrative of the story actually begins, when Sebastian Foxx was 13-year-old Sebastião Raposa playing upon the cobbled streets of Lisbon in 1745, the sadistic executioners of the Inquisition took his "New Christian" parents away and caused their deaths. They destroyed Foxx's family, shattering his life into jagged sharp-edged shards that ceaselessly cut and wounded his soul. Through the aid of one of his father's friends, Sebastião is rescued from the Inquisitors' grasping hands and spirited to London where he becomes a ward of the renowned Benjamin Weaver, the stalwart, resolute champion of three of Liss' previous works.

Though he finds safety, comfort, education and affection in Weaver's home, Foxx does not find peace. He is tortured by the nightmare he cannot cast out of his mind, namely, the horrific fate of his parents and worse, the constant, unalleviated guilt he feels for having abandoned them.

Ten years after arriving in London, unable to bear the guilt and the anger that daily tear at his conscience, Foxx leaves a note for Weaver explaining why he must depart the home in which he found shelter. He plans to travel back to Lisbon to avenge his parents' murder and to seek out the girl whom he loved in Lisbon those many years ago, if she is still alive.

It is only in that way, Foxx believes, that he can atone for the "sin" of having abandoned his mother and father and "make peace" with them. As he explains, "for sins of one man against another, the Day of Atonement does not atone, until they have made peace with each other."

So, Sebastião Raposa, now fully the Englishman Sebastian Foxx, sets out on his fateful journey back to the city that seared unhealed torment into his life. As soon as he arrives in Portugal, it is quickly apparent that danger lurks there. Having adopted the religion of his ancestors while living with Weaver, Sebastian returns as a Jew, probably the only Jew who dared to step foot in Inquisition-terrorized Lisbon.

And this is merely how the book begins!

Liss has perfected the art of suspenseful historical fiction. The Day of Atonement is: packed with precise detail of time and place; thoughtful and provocative in the larger, moral, human issues that underpin the story; replete with a vivid roster of robust, well-developed, engaging individuals of variously noble and sinister characters; and a complex tale of fast-paced, tightly told, gut-wrenching action with myriad, unpredictable twists and turns of plot.

The Day of Atonement is somewhat of a sequel (although it may be stretching the term) to three of Liss' eight previous works A Conspiracy of Paper, A Spectacle of Corruption and The Devil's Company in which the steely-eyed, rakish, ethical, tender yet intimidating Benjamin Weaver is the main character.

Weaver has been described by the author-historian Ross King as "one of historical fiction's most compelling action heroes." Based upon the real life Daniel Mendoza, a Sephardi Jew who was a champion boxer in London's East End at the turn of the 18th century, Weaver is a Jewish former boxer, private investigator and debt collector whom Liss uses as a literary springboard.

Weaver is Sebastian Foxx's mentor. Foxx, we are meant to understand, is a younger, rough-edged, not-yet fully-formed Benjamin Weaver, who deliberately places himself in harm's way far from the people and resources he might summon to help extricate him from the dire difficulties that lie in wait.

Ever present in the alleyways, inns, and markets of Lisbon is the dark, looming presence of the Inquisition. It hovers like a malevolent ghost peering around each corner. It casts a pall over sun and sky, spawning fear and drowning courage. Nevertheless, Foxx confronts the Inquisition at its very epicentre, the Palace, "the most dreaded structure in Lisbon," to find the man responsible for his parents' deaths.

"I moved purposefully, as if I belonged - another skill learned from Mr. Weaver – and made my way across the marble floors, past the great oil paintings and gilt statues and altars. So much wealth, bought with New Christian gold, acquired with New Christian blood," Foxx states.

"So many of my people, my family, had been dragged into this place, put to the question, imprisoned, tortured, murdered. This place was the very heart of Lisbon's evil, the machine that fed upon human flesh and churned out ruined husks."

Outside the Palace, Foxx sees an unassuming, simple pastry seller taken to the Palace for questioning.

"I had seen men taken away by the Inquisition before. My childhood had been full of such scenes, and that this one unfolded according to the ancient script made it no less dreadful to witness. The man struggled and cried out for help. He twisted his neck to one side and then the other, as if looking for something that would rescue him. No one looked at him, their morbid curiosity crushed by their will to not appear too interested.

"The man shouted that he was innocent, that he had done nothing, that he was a good Christian, but the soldiers did not react.... In a matter of seconds, everything he had had been stripped from him and there was nothing in his future but torment and isolation and want. He stopped shouting his innocence and instead began to wail, helplessly and hopelessly, as he grieved for all he had known."

Whether Foxx ultimately does restore order to his broken life - indeed whether he even escapes Lisbon with his life - is the key intrigue and creative tension that fills each page of The Day of Atonement. It is an absorbing and rich reading experience. ■

Susur Lee goes kosher

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Susur Lee and Moishe Brown make an unlikely pair.

Lee, the Hong Kong-born, Toronto-based celebrity chef known for his near empire of trendy restaurants and repertory of television appearances, is, at 57, statuesque and polished, practically larger than life.

Brown, 36, the owner of Toronto company Modern Kosher Catering, is soft-spoken and quietly self-possessed, kippah-clad.

And yet, there seems to exist between them – each the master of his kitchen – an easy understanding and respect.

Graciously addressing one another only as "chef," the two convened Jan. 28 at Lee's chic, Asian fusion restaurant Bent, located on Dundas Street West, to discuss their forthcoming culinary collaboration.

Together, they're creating an exclusive line of kosher, Susur Lee-branded food, to be added to Modern Kosher's existing list of menu options.

Brown, who attended culinary school in Israel and launched Modern Kosher in 2013, has made it his mission to enliven, and inject elements of contemporary food culture, into traditional kosher fare.

He typically caters events like bar/bat mitzvahs, weddings and baby namings, and, though based out of the kitchen at Adath Israel Congregation, he'll also cater at other synagogues or venues.

"I've moved away from just doing the kugels and gefilte fishes," he said, "introducing new ingredients…importing stuff from Israel or the United States…trying different fusions."

Brown sees this latest venture – which came about roughly six months ago when a member of Adath Israel met Lee at a local sports club and decided to connect the two chefs – as an obvious boon.

Since first promoting the collaboration on Facebook two weeks ago, he said his bookings have increased.

"For the last so many years, I've been finding that a lot of wedding parties want to go to outside venues instead of shuls," Brown said. "I've already met with three different young couples whose parents haven't been to any of Lee's restaurants, but they have, and they're really excited [to have his food at their weddings]. The younger demographic is very difficult to attract, so [this venture] is already proving its point."

The menu they're co-developing will meld Lee's brand of Asian fusion with both traditional eastern European and Mediterranean-style kosher foods.

For example, they spoke of exploring Asian variations on braised meat (brisket), and dishes like crispy duck with wild blueberry preserve, sashimi with citrus sauce and latkes with caramelized onions and mustard seeds.

"We want to lighten up the eastern European style of food, which can be quite heavy," Brown said.

Lee, whose experience making "Jewish" food consists of a Jewish National Fund-sponsored culinary tour to Israel nearly a decade ago, has fully embraced the challenge of cooking within kashrut's guidelines; he and Brown have been meeting regularly to brainstorm menus and review regulations.

"I like this slow engagement we've had, my getting to know the cultural background," Lee mused. "I think working within specific limitations and making the food taste amazing – that's the challenge. Making kosher food is so specific, and I like specific things."

His stint in Israel was enough to pique his interest in Jewish food. "I felt really connected when I went there," Lee recalled, "and saw all the variety of fish, breads, the best Lebanese foods, shakshuka – I had the best shakshuka – I felt people there are really passionate."

He grinned, adding, "I did make one mistake there. I was making chickpeas and…I picked up the wrong bucket to add water to them and all of a sudden, I see this rabbi running over yelling, 'You're killing my people!' I was like, 'Holy shit, this is really serious.'"

"We've been swapping mashgiach stories," Brown chuckled.

Lee was quick to note that Asian cooking is also not without limitations, given that Asian chefs often forgo the use of dairy.

Of course, Lee's interest in kashrut doesn't stem purely from curiosity; he explained that a large number of his restaurant clientele, particularly at his downtown Toronto Chinese restaurant Luckee, are Jewish.

"I have a lot of really good connections with Jewish people," he said. "There's so many opportunities to explore, be creative and think outside the box [with Jewish food]."

Brown and Lee will launch the line March 12, when they'll co-host a sample dinner at Adath Israel for press and select members of the community.

In addition to expanding his customer base, Brown believes his existing clients will welcome the innovation.

"In terms of the future of the palate of the Jewish people of Toronto," he said, "I think they will appreciate this lightening up of kosher food." ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

When it comes to cartoons, Spiegelman paved the way

"Prior to the publication of the first issue of RAW, Art Spiegelman and François Mouly gave a few interviews that I found captivating. What Art said about the potential of the medium was very inspiring to me. And then he began to serialize Maus. I couldn't have predicted the impact it would have, but reading that first chapter, I knew it would be a masterpiece. Maus showed that, if they're good enough, serious comics can have a very large audience."

- Chester Brown, Canadian cartoonist

Like leading Toronto-based cartoonist Chester Brown, I distinctly remember my first encounter with Maus. Unlike Brown and the great Canadian cartoonist Seth quoted earlier, I was not immersed in comic culture and so was not aware of RAW and Spiegelman's catalytic presence in a cartooning revolution when, as a student living in New York, I bought a copy of Maus I at the Strand bookstore on Broadway in the fall of 1987. I bought it as a book, from a new release table, not in a vast and expansive section of comics and graphic novels that my oldest daughter can now lose a day in at the Strand. (My daughters, like many Canadian kids, would be introduced to Maus at school.) Back in the 1980s, there was no large comic section, but there may have been a shelf of comic material somewhere in the sprawling multi-story landmark that still remains a vibrant hub of activity with its distinct red banners in lower Manhattan.

Spiegelman clearly helped create the demand and boom in comic publishing and also reminded us how important the printed book is as a creative and tactile form. In 1991, back in Canada, I bought Maus II when it first came out at Pages on Queen Street West, a truly great independent bookstore with a dedicated comics section that sadly closed in 2012. Fortunately, we still have The Beguiling and TCAF (Toronto Comic Arts Festival).

"Since The Beguiling opened in 1987, Art Spiegelman's work has introduced more readers to the medium than any other author – from the adult non-comics readers converted by Maus, to, more recently, the children who started with Little Lit and Toon books as their first comics. Even now, with a market crowded with books that followed his successes, his books are still the books people cite as sparking their love of comics."

- Peter Birkemoe, The Beguiling Books & Art Inc. and TCAF

Toronto has emerged as a leading centre of comic arts internationally and Spiegelman's influence in this community is substantial (as it has been in Montreal through comics publisher Drawn and Quarterly). This has carried over to the current emerging generation of artists, many of whom have established significant international reputations in their own right, thriving in the creative space Spiegelman (and Mouly) have shaped. Nina Bunjevac (whose second major graphic novel, Fatherland, was recently published worldwide by Random House) and Michael Deforge, who continues to make his mark as a leading innovator, are great examples.

"Any cartoonist who doesn't realize that Spiegelman paved our way, twice, is a fool," says Bunjevac with her characteristic bluntness. "He first did it with RAW, and then again with Maus. I would not be doing what I am doing now were it not for having been exposed to both. It's that simple."

Deforge adds that "Art Spiegelman pushed the edges of what the medium could be, both in the formal experiments in his own comics and in his work as an editor."

Toronto publisher Annie Koyama sums it all up nicely: "Without Art, and his publishing partner Françoise Mouly, there would be no art comics. Without Art, and his trailblazing experimentation and fearlessness in mining his own past, there wouldn't be a comic honoured with the literary world's top prize. Without Art, comics would be a poorer place."

As often happens when an artist produces a work of such power, popularity and influence, that work can become almost a burden, even a barrier. Maus, at times, has certainly been that for Spiegelman, not only because of its phenomenal success, but also clearly because of the intense personal demands telling such a tale put upon the author.

It would not be until post 9/11 that Spiegelman would once again attempt a work of scope and ambition on par with Maus (In the Shadow of No Towers, 2004), but he has remained a constant provocative presence, particularly through his many iconic covers for the New Yorker. His black on black silhouette of the Twin Towers must be considered one of the most powerful responses to the events of Sept. 11, 2001.

Spiegelman's work stands as great art, the argument of its art status resolved. How could such a body of work so deeply rooted in (and building on) long recognized traditions of visual and graphic arts and literature, and that has had such a fundamental impact on culture, not be.

Art Spiegelman likes to point out that spiegel in German means mirror, so his name equals, in essence, "Art Mirrors Man." Spiegelman has always been bold in his convictions and has never shied away from holding up the mirror and also seeing his own reflection in it. His most powerful works (and there are many) expose the wounds that often fester and won't heal, and he has been unflinching in his willingness to engage with the trauma of history and memory as trauma. His Pulitzer Prize was well earned and richly deserved. ■

Performers run between eight and 10 kilometres each show

"We did a lot of running and talking," Israel says. "I initiated conversations on different things [with the performers] and out of that, I made different tasks where movement and material could be developed."

The choreographer also hired a writer, Asa Wolfson, to watch rehearsals and document parts of the conversations between the cast members. Along with help from the performers, Wolfson and Israel collaborated on the initial text.

"In a way, the text was made the way choreography is made... improvising and weaving it together," Israel says.

The show premiered at Israel's Acco Festival in 2012. The version of Marathon that will run in Toronto, from Feb. 4 to 6, will feature one performance each day: the first and last show will be in English, while the middle show will be in Hebrew with English subtitles.

Ilya Domanov and Merav Dagan, two of the original three cast members, are still touring with the show. Gal Shamai, who has completed several half-marathons, was a natural fit to join the small group of performers when one of the original cast members dropped out.

"Originally, I looked for people whose presence was interesting for me or who carried a kind of personal story that I felt like I can relate to," Israel says. "When I looked for a replacement, I had to find someone who has the running skills already."

For much of the show, the running doesn't stop. (The performers sometimes get walking breaks.) Israel estimates that the performers run between eight and 10 kilometres during each 60-minute show.

Israel says that she has never had to stop a production in the middle due to exhaustion or dehydration. However, some shows have been cancelled.

"It's not a piece you can perform if you're not fully fit," she says.

Marathon is in Toronto as part of the Progress Festival and Spotlight on Israeli Culture and will be co-presented by the Koffler Centre of the Arts. Following Toronto, Marathon will head to festivals in Peterborough, Ottawa and Vancouver.

The Koffler Centre also offers two multi-day workshops, led by Israel, where she will discuss her process and teach local artists about themes inherent to her work.

The first, Intelligent Body, runs on Feb. 6 and 7, and focuses on combining dance and movement with a text. The second, Seeing Through Movement, is open to all artists and deals more with the human perception of visual space and movement. That workshop runs on Feb. 9 and 10. ■

Marathon is co-presented with the Koffler Centre for the Arts, and supported by Spotlight on Israeli Culture, the Embassy of Israel, and the Israeli Consulate (Toronto). Feb.4-6, 7:30 p.m., the Theatre Centre, 1115 Queen St. W.

WRY BREAD

Tree-planting ceremony ends in bloodshed, cupcakes

David Levine

It started as a simple and pleasant Tu b'Shvat outing – planting trees in a community garden to celebrate Judaism's agricultural New Year – but after a booking conflict created a shortage of trees, the situation turned ugly.

"The trip got off to a great start," says teacher Rebecca Kronfeld. Along with parent volunteer Bethany Epstein, Kronfeld was taking her Grade 6 students to plant trees, a time-honoured way to observe Judaism's least annoying holiday.

"The kids were so excited. We'd been prepping for weeks – learning about the holiday, and how to do the planting. Only three kids threw up on the bus!"

Kronfeld says the 57 students in her class were walking toward the field when the confrontation first occurred.

"This van just pulls up out of nowhere, driving the wrong way up a one-way street, and almost hitting Daniel B. They parked diagonally across the intersection. Then they got out and all heck broke loose."

"That's not what happened at all," protests Burt Schwartz, 78, resident of Withered Acres Retirement Community and head of its excursion committee, as well as the driver in question.

"I was going the speed limit. I never came close to that boy – who was too busy staring at his Game Boy to look up! When I was young, cars would drive right next to you. Sometimes they'd bump your elbow. Did we complain?"

But the real conflict was yet to come: Organizer and head planter Howard Fluge explains that an "innocent mix-up" with the calendar led to a situation in which "only a limited number of holes had been dug and only a limited number of saplings were available."

"The error is my fault," Fluge confesses. "Even though it was our intern's job, and I told him a hundred times to double-check the bookings. I take full responsibility for his failures."

Fluge says he tried to reason with both groups, "but once they realized that we only had enough saplings for one group, neither was in the mood to compromise."

The ensuing chaos has proven difficult to reconstruct. Forensic teams have determined that as word of the shortage spread, both groups made a beeline for the available trees. Some students found their path obstructed by a makeshift barricade of canes and walkers, while others were quick enough to avoid the trap.

Kronfeld saw it all from the parking lot: "Stephanie G. and Marshall were the first to reach the saplings. They grabbed as many as they could and ran out to the field. When the rest of the students tried to follow, the old folks turned and ran after them. That's when The Buddy System failed us."

Burt Schwartz sees it differently: "We were just going to plant trees. The next thing you know, all these kids are swarming around us – like a street gang. They laughed at us and ran out to plant our trees. That upset some of the group."

Fluge, perhaps the only impartial observer, saw "the students running ahead to plant trees with the old folks bearing down on them. Several of the elderly people tried to brandish their canes as clubs, though some of them fell over while trying the manoeuvre."

While some students managed to plant their saplings properly, most just tossed them in the ground and ran, with barely enough time to take a selfie before escaping the wrinkled wrath.

"At least a dozen students tripped and fell while running back up the field," says Fluge. "Some of them landed on the old folks, who were slowly crawling out to uproot and replant the saplings themselves. It was a mess."

"They turned on our kids," says Kronfeld. "Jeremy W. was whacked in the shins by a cane. Someone poured Metamucil in Brittany L.'s hair."

Schwartz disagrees.

"Those hoodlums were violent and disrespectful to their elders. Hildie Green is 98 years old, healthy as an ox. Two days later? Renal failure. Just like that."

Whoever is at fault, Fluge doesn't want other schools or retirement facilities to shy away from the activity. "It's a great way to bring the community together," he says. "Maybe don't bring your grandparents." ■

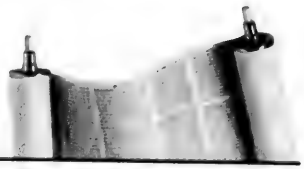
Parshah

Yitro | Exodus 18:1 - 20:23



Rabbi Aaron Katchen explores Jewish views on ecology and environmentalism
Rabbi Michal Shekel says silence can provide a breath of spiritual fresh air
Rabbi Howard Morrison analyses portraits of Yitro in Jewish tradition

Aaron Katchen

"When in your war against a city you must lay siege to it for a long time in order to capture it, you must not destroy its trees, wielding the axe against them. You may eat of them, but you must not cut them down. Are trees of the field human to withdraw before you into the besieged city? Only trees that you know do not yield food may be destroyed. You may cut them down for constructing siege-works against the city that is waging war on you, until it has been reduced" (Deut. 19:20).

Whether talking about the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil or the Tree of Life, trees have an important place in the Torah. In Deut. 20:19-20, the Torah discusses the rules of war and sieges. The turn of phrase is very interesting in the Hebrew – "ki ha'adam hu etz ha'sadeh." These words can be understood as translated above, or they could be interpreted as, "For a person is a tree of the field." The midrash (Sifrei) relates to that metaphor and states that a person's life is from the tree of the field. This comes as a warning: we are meant to get utility from the earth, but it will come at a cost. The unnecessary destruction of the trees will be our destruction as well.

Today, this concept is highlighted in our commemoration of Tu b'Shvat. The recognition of a New Year for Trees may seem odd, but the holiday's origins actually related to the Temple in Jerusalem, regarding when we were allowed to benefit from the produce of our trees. As time passed, the kabbalists in Safed created a seder, mirroring the Passover seder, as an inroad to the deeper meanings of creation. In modern times, Tu b'Shvat has become a day to explore Jewish views of ecology and environmentalism. ■

Michal Shekel

Like for many of you, the excitement of the Super Bowl is still fresh in my mind: the buzzing anticipation followed by hoopla accompanying the plays, the sound and lights, and even the half-time special effects draw the attention of non-enthusiasts and diehard fans alike.

How do you top that? Sinai: covered by clouds, lightning flash and the blare of the horn grew louder and louder (Exodus 19:19). Biblically, this was the "pre-game show," the introduction to matan Torah, the giving of the Torah.

Surprisingly, things change dramatically when we get to the main event. Midrash Shmot Rabbah recounts that no animal made a sound, the sea stopped roaring, and even the Divine creatures were still. A hush fell over the entire world as God began to speak.

Revelation took place in absolute silence. A well-known tradition states that God spoke only the first word of the first commandment, anochi, I am. Yet another teaching states that God only spoke the first letter of the first word of the first commandment: the silent letter aleph.

Today, the noise of modern society distracts us from creation and Creator. Still, we choose sound to separate ourselves from the world. We make a cocoon of it, while taking silence for granted. We play our favourite music to drown out the sounds around us as we go about our daily tasks. Worse, we disparage silence. In the media, it's called "dead air."

Yet silence is the spiritual equivalent of a breath of fresh air. The practice of Mussar recognizes two types of silence: shtikah is the familiar wordless, noiseless silence, while dumiyah is a deeper silence, a progression from silence to stillness. Shtikah is what the body desires. Dumiyah is what the soul craves. It is the stillness when we perceive God at Sinai. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

Howard Morrison

Who exactly was Yitro? How is he portrayed in Jewish tradition?

One interpretation suggests he was a righteous non-Jew, originally an Egyptian priest who advised Pharaoh. When Yitro saw his advice wasn't heeded, he fled to Midian. Another view suggests that mentioning Yitro right after the episode of Amalek teaches that while there are non-Jews who predicate their existence on hating the Jewish People, like Amalek, there are also righteous non-Jews like Yitro who admire the Jewish People and its ideas.

Another interpretation suggests Yitro actually converted to Judaism and became what today we call a Jew by choice. In this context, he was permitted to give advice to Moses. Was he a sincere Jew by choice? One voice suggests he joined the people of Israel only after Amalek was defeated in order to save himself. Another suggests Yitro was inspired by the miracle of the Exodus, a paradigm for religious and physical freedom, and sincerely recited the words, "Blessed is God who saves Israel."

So we have multiple portraits of Yitro: righteous non-Jew who loved and supported the people of Israel, or Jew by choice whose motivation is understood in more than one way. From the various interpretations, we have lessons we can apply to our contemporary challenges.

It's a positive benefit for the Jewish community to form meaningful alliances with non-Jews in ways that reinforce shared values and concerns. Over my 28 years as a pulpit rabbi, I've been blessed to have friends and associations with clergy and others from outside the Jewish faith. Alternatively, over the generations, Judaism has offered a method of sincere conversion to Judaism. In my years serving the Jewish community, I've been blessed to have worked with countless numbers of sincere Jews by choice.

While the middle of the parshah focuses on the dramatic events at Mount Sinai, don't forget the beginning of the portion and its many lessons derived from the question, "Who was Yitro?" ■

Rabbi Howard Morrison is senior clergy at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

Standup comic turns disability into comedy gold

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT WINNIPEG

At age 12, Adam Schwartz was told that he had a form of autism called Asperger's syndrome.

But rather than letting his condition hold him back, the South African-born Schwartz – his parents, Peter and Hilda, moved the family to Winnipeg when he was five – has managed to earn a master's degree in library and information sciences and is building up a second career (by day he works for the Winnipeg Public Library system) as a standup comic, the basis of whose routine revolves around the challenges that he faces as someone with Asperger's.

One example of his humour: he says that in high school gym class, his classmates were impressed with his prowess at the water fountain.

Asperger's is a developmental disorder that affects a person's ability to socialize and communicate effectively with others. "I can't read body language or tonal language," Schwartz points out. "And I used to perseverate a lot."

Five years ago, in an effort to improve his social skills, Schwartz, now 28, began taking acting classes. Those classes morphed into standup comedy.

He says he actually finds it easier to get up in front of an audience than to have one-on-one contact. He started out performing at open mic nights once or twice a week. He was a finalist for the Winnipeg Free Press' Wackiest Comedian contest in 2011.

In 2013, he put together a show for the Winnipeg Fringe Festival. "Aspergers: A Tale of a Social Misfit" that focuses on his trouble making friends and connecting with the ladies. The show brought him quite a bit of local notice, including interviews on CBC Radio and television.

Last year, he took the show to the Fringe in Saskatoon, and this summer, he will be making his debut at the Toronto Fringe Festival in July and the Victoria Fringe in August.

Adam Schwartz

> When a crowd is silent, it throws me off more than most comedians, because it is unexpected, and I don't do unexpected well

In one of his blogs on his website Autism Spectrum Connection Schwartz wrote about how he has to prepare for his performances. "I have to avoid sensory overload," he wrote in a February 2013 post. "I rarely go into situations where I don't know what to expect. No matter what situation I get myself into, whether it is at a bar or going to work or home, I always know what to expect. I know that when I get up in front of a stage to perform, the sound I will likely hear is laughter. I know that before and after the show, there will be conversations going on, with something funny occasionally thrown in for variety. When a crowd is silent, it throws me off more than most comedians, because it is unexpected, and I don't do unexpected well. Therefore, I am up there trying to salvage the show not only for the audience's benefit but also for the benefit of my own sanity, because the longer the new situation goes on, the greater the chance I will have a problem with sensory overload."

He is happy to report that he has generally received warm and friendly responses from his audiences.

Coming up, he has several shows already booked including a coffee house performance in early April commemorating Autistic Awareness Day in Canada.

Schwartz's website also provides links to autism studies and resources and programs across Canada for people with autism. He reports that he is also in the process of creating a new charity – Autistic Productions – whose goal would be to change people's views about autism and Asperger's syndrome. ■

Dario Teitelbaum: Meretz party is the only left-wing Zionist option

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Dario Teitelbaum, the Argentine-born head of the World Union of Meretz (WUM), the international network for supporters of Israel's left-wing, social democratic Zionist Meretz party, as well as other progressive Zionist groups, was in Toronto last month, where he met with local groups and activists affiliated with progressive Zionism. He spoke to The CJN about the state of Zionism, the upcoming Israeli elections and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

What was the specific purpose of your trip to Toronto, and how does this relate to WUM's overall agenda?

I came to Toronto to meet people, to create a dialogue around the agenda of the WUM and to meet with groups like JSpace, Hashomer Hatzair and people from different factions of Jewish Zionist politics and the Reform movement.

WUM is in charge of maintaining the relationship between Israel and leftist Jewish groups in the Diaspora.

The WUM is a way for people with the same way of thinking to come together around the policies of Israel we're trying to promote. We do kind of bridge-building, to keep people around the world within the idea of Zionism, to keep it relevant to daily life.

Our attempt is to keep people within Zionist organizations and working with Israel, while having the right to express dissent about Israel.

What are some of WUM's concerns about the current state of Zionism?

We're concerned that Zionism right now is considered to be equal to the political right, to the messianic conception of Israel. Somehow people today, when you talk about Zionism, understand it as being part of the right or that it means blindly supporting any action taken by the Israeli government. So we're trying to say that we support the State of Israel, but we also criticize Israeli policies, especially those regarding the conflict with the Palestinians.

There isn't legitimacy for, on one hand loving Israel and, on the other hand, criticizing it. It's not happening deeply enough. I believe that being a Zionist today means supporting the peace process in the Middle East.

What are WUM's biggest concerns at present regarding the current Israeli government's methods?

Meretz believes that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is leading using a policy of not doing. The government is very conservative and is always responding to situations, but not taking initiative. They have been losing opportunities, like they did after the war in Gaza this past summer. Hamas was really weak, and it was worth re-opening negotiations after the war, but instead, now we have Palestinians going to the UN, trying to get into the International Criminal Court, taking Israel to task for violations of human rights. We must look at where this situation is taking us.

Do you believe that the war last summer seriously damaged Israel's reputation internationally?

Before reputation, I care about life. On one hand, we in Israel were living under the threat of missiles for 14 years, so the government has to defend the population. But only defending the population is not good enough. Every two or three years we have another round of violence and nothing moves forward, and the situation in Gaza gets more difficult. That brings people in Gaza to a situation where they feel they don't have anything to lose.

We talk in Israel about living in a kind of continuous state of trauma. The last military action [in the summer] lasted 50 days, which created a huge damage to the population. Half the population had to leave their region and have a kind of exile within their own country, and there was a general kind of loss of confidence in the military.

We need to take steps to change the situation and not accept this kind of living for people around the Gaza Strip and the north of Israel. That's what we demand of Netanyahu.

How would the Meretz party have responded differently to the events of last summer, namely, the kidnapping and murder of three Israeli teenagers?

That's a hypothetical question and difficult to answer. The question is, really, what we would have done to avoid a situation like this. We would change the approach to the conflict in such a way to avoid such a dilemma.

Do you believe a two-state solution is still possible?

I think that's one of the main issues Israel is facing right now – whether the situation we've created is irreversible or not. I believe we still have time to stop creating new settlements, to create an atmosphere that's pro-dialogue with the Palestinians. I'm speaking idealistically, but I'm worried. I know we have very difficult partners and we have to choose the right people to talk to and reinforce them, and not give more power to the most extreme elements. Today, through terrorism and rockets, the most extreme set the rules of the game.

What are the Meretz party's major campaign issues in the upcoming Israeli election?

"People today... understand [Zionism] as being part of the right."

Since the Labor party [led by Isaac Herzog] joined forces with the centrist Hatnua movement [led by Tzipi Livni], they've been trying to reach out to centre and right-wing voters, so Meretz is now the one and only left-wing Zionist party.

We are going to present our platform not only regarding the peace process but also regarding what's happening in our society in Israel. To have the economy in the hands of [the country's wealthiest] 20 to 25 families is crazy. To increase, year after year, the level of social injustice in Israel and the lack of prospects for the younger generations, we're going to put all of that on the table.

We now have three women in the first five positions in our party. The feminist and gender equality viewpoint is also going to be part of our agenda, and it's not something ideological for us. It's just part of life.

There are people who say Meretz only has one issue, and that's not true. To have a two-state solution is one of our main issues, but while other parties are going to try to make the issues of the country seem like they've disappeared and not bring them into the election, we're going to bring them back to the table.

I think today there is [formal] equality among Israel citizens, but it's not something meaningful. For minorities, at the level of law, everything looks OK, but at the level of life, minorities – and I'm talking about women, working immigrants, different populations in Israel that don't get the rights they're supposed to – there is much to improve. ■

A female spy helped change the course of WWII

Backstory

EROL ARAF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Discerning minds toiling in the subterranean labyrinths of espionage have known that women are by nature endowed with a wide range of creative, emotional, spiritual and dissimulative qualities that make them perfect spies.

There is a well-entrenched inclination to see the spying business as a male prerogative. This view is anchored in "snoopy" thrillers where male secret agents display amazing skills in chasing bad guys on the rooftops of the Grand Bazaar in Istanbul with motorcycles, helicopters, vertical and horizontal propulsion devices, jumping, nay, flying from one cupola to another with undiminished enthusiasm but uncertain results.

The de rigueur "beautiful Mossad girl" or Bond women doing their mermaid imitations or a villainess implausibly named "Pussy Galore" are often portrayed in supporting or destined to fail roles. But this presents a distorted view, as women have demonstrated the strength of their allegiances with courage, determination and cunning matching their male counterparts.

Writing in Forbes, Maseena Ziegler quotes Mossad's head, Tamir Prodo, praising female spies for their "distinct advantage in secret warfare because of their ability to multitask." He also said women are "better at playing a role" and superior to men when it comes to "suppressing their ego in order to attain their goals." And these feline qualities were in full display during World War II on the Allied side.

An Indian princess, a mother superior at a convent in Paris, a New Zealander most wanted by the Gestapo and a hedonistic Peruvian guava heiress are just some of the more colourful players in the cast of female spies who hoodwinked the generals of Adolf Hitler's mighty phalanxes and outwitted the death head terror squads of the Third Reich.

But it is the story of a young Jewish woman in Cairo, operating under the pseudonym "Yvette" and working for MI 6 and the Jewish Agency – the inspiration for Ken Follet's novel Key to Rebecca – that stands out from all the rest.

The moment "Yvette" set eyes on John Eppler, dressed in the uniform of a British captain, speaking with a Saar accent, pretending to be South African and using British pound notes instead of Egyptian money in a Cairo nightclub, she knew he was a Nazi spy.

"Yvette" was spot on: Eppler was the head of the German Kondor Mission sent to Cairo by Field Marshal Rommel, the Desert Fox, to find out about British plans as Rommel was preparing his final assault on the Egyptian capital. Incidentally, the film The English Patient also deals with extensive Nazi efforts to sneak spies into the British-controlled Middle East during the War.

"Yvette" insinuated herself into Eppler's world and, yes, she became his lover. Roaming freely in Eppler's boathouse on the Nile, she saw Daphne du Maurier's Rebecca on the table with a notepaper covered with gridded squares and six-letter groups. She understood that she was looking at the cipher the Nazis were using to transmit valuable information to Rommel. She had what she needed to break her cover and immediately informed MI 6. In a matter of hours, the members of the Nazi Kondor spy ring were behind bars.

The boys and girls at Bletchley Park, working feverishly, finally broke the code. This breakthrough allowed Field Marshal Bernard Montgomery to launch one of the greatest deceptions since the Greeks left a giant wooden horse at Helen's gate. The British successfully impersonated Eppler, brilliantly deceived Rommel and led Hitler eventually to his first major defeat, at El Alamein.

As Winston Churchill observed, "We had neither a victory before nor a defeat after" that fateful encounter on the burning sands of North Africa.

I often wonder what would have happened to Jews in then-Palestine if Rommel had succeeded and marched all the way to Jerusalem to shake Haj Amin al-Husseini's hand.

"Yvette" returned to Israel after the war, married and raised a magnificent family. ■

Minyan-goer told to get out, and rabbis seek to end stigma

Recalcitrant husband turfed

A man who has refused to give his wife a religious divorce for 18 years was thrown out of a minyan at Yeshiva University in New York Feb. 3. The Beth Din of America has ruled the man must give the get, and Jewish law forbids including men like him in minyans, said the Office for the Resolution of Agunot (ORA), a New York-based modern Orthodox group that tracks recalcitrant husbands. The man was thrown out after being spotted by ORA executive director Rabbi Jeremy Stern. "We're not davening Ma'ariv until you leave," the rabbi is heard saying on a YouTube video that had more than 34,000 views by the end of last week. "You're not welcome to daven here... It's ludicrous... 18 years... you're a rasha [wicked person]."

Disabled can marry, group says

Seeking to overturn a stigma among some rabbis that discourages marriages between people with cognitive disabilities, the Israeli liberal Orthodox group Beit Hillel has ruled that the unions are OK according to Halachah. Some rabbis have refused to perform marriages for people with such disabilities as Down syndrome or severe autism, believing couples wouldn't be able to fulfil the requirements of Jewish marriage and household. Beit Hillel released a similar paper last year detailing why people with intellectual disabilities can celebrate a bar or bat mitzvah and be recognized as adults under Jewish law.

Rivlin reaches out to Arabs

Israeli President Reuven Rivlin called last week for the building of a new city to accommodate Israel's growing Arab minority. Rivlin met Feb. 5 with 50 Arab local council heads and mayors to discuss integration and development. He also called for the creation of schools to "continue to deepen the integration of the Arabic language in all our children's educations." Mazen Ghanaian, mayor of Sakhnin, an Arab city, and head of the committee for Arab municipalities, called for Rivlin's help on unemployment, particularly among men, which he said is "a phenomenon plaguing all parts of the country." ■

Dealing with domestic abuse

Violence is a learned behaviour. Boys who grow up in homes with abuse and domestic violence are nearly four times more likely to perpetrate domestic abuse than those who grow up in homes without it. Because violence in the home tends to be a child's first experience of it and is often defended as either inevitable or trivial, it becomes the root and justifier of all violence for many.

We must intervene early. By doing so we can protect the women and children who become the first victims.

Arguably one way to begin the process is for our Jewish schools to take their reporting of abuse under our laws more seriously. It is not about calling home, it is about calling Jewish Family & Child.

Bibi and Bougie go to D.C.

I take exception to the tone and message in the editorial "Bibi and Bougie go to Washington" (Jan. 29).

It seems to disassociate the primary concern of Israelis in the upcoming elections, the economy, from foreign relations, which ranked very low by comparison.

To dismiss the visits of the leaders of two of the most important parties to Washington during this time is to display a shocking lack of understanding and appreciation for realpolitik. Like it or not, Israel's very survival depends upon the support of the United States, and particularly its Congress. Building and expanding this support only strengthens Israel, while playing footsie with President Barack Obama is a proven waste of time. And a stronger Israel will have a more robust economy, better security and improved social justice.

I welcome these visits, over just several days, during which ongoing relationships with key decision-makers will be strengthened and new ones established. It seems to me that these results would benefit Israel and all Israelis a lot more than another campaign stop in Ashkelon or Safed.

Iran is not the threat

A Feb. 5 letter "Dealing with Iran," makes some serious errors.

It wrongly assumes that Iran is trying to produce nuclear weapons. However, in March 2013, U.S. Director of National Intelligence James Clapper confirmed that Iran has not decided to develop a nuclear weapon and that it would be unable to do so secretly.

It repeats the false accusation that Iranian leaders threaten to wipe Israel out. However, in 2012, then-Israeli deputy prime minister Dan Meridor acknowledged that then-Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad never said that Iran seeks to "wipe Israel off the face of the map." While the western media regularly present Iran as a dire threat to world peace, Iran has in fact not invaded any country since the 1700s – in marked contrast to the United States and Israel.

As for threatening Jews, the Islamic Republic, while anti-Zionist, is not anti-Semitic as manifested in its treatment of Iran's Jewish community – the largest of any Muslim-majority country. The Jewish community in Iran dates back more than 2,000 years, continues to run kosher shops, Hebrew schools and synagogues, and has guaranteed representation in parliament. The main source of evil today is clearly ISIS, and an effective force countering ISIS is Iran. Therefore, it is fair to ask: which country is better confronting today's evil, Iran or Israel?

It should not be difficult for Canadians to understand that the conflict the United States and Israel have with Iran is due to geopolitics, not ideology. Iran wants to be recognized as a major regional power, while the United States and Israel want to frustrate that goal to preserve their regional pre-eminence. Many informed Israelis freely acknowledge this reality. For example, according to Eliezer Tsafrir, former head of Israeli intelligence on Iran and Iraq: "However ideological and Islamic, everything Iran was doing was nationalistic, and even similar to the Shah."

RABBI-2-RABBI

Be not afraid, for God is with you

Fear is part of being human, but as we struggle to find our way through life's rough waters, we know we're never alone, even if we don't have all the answers.

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Fishman: We're told that God did not lead the Jewish People out of Egypt in a direct manner, but rather took them on a circuitous route. This was done so that if the people saw war, they would be afraid and wish to return to Egypt. Miracles are a dime a dozen, but God has to work with the human heart and realize all of our human foibles and fears.

As one commentator has put it: "God is able to change nature, but He can't change human nature." I think it's natural for a person to have fears and concerns and worries, and having faith does not necessarily equate with having clarity and confidence. Actually, living with faith includes uncertainty.

Rabbi Splansky: The most often-repeated mitzvah in the Tanach is: "Thou shalt not fear." More than 120 times we are commanded: "Be not afraid." When Avram sets out into uncharted territory, he is told, "Al tira." When Hagar is about to give into her loneliness and despair, an angel of God calls out, "Al tir-ee." At the shores of the Red Sea as Pharoah's army is advancing, Moses says "Al tira-u."

Our ancestors heard these words just when they needed them most. Some say this is evidence that God is a "crutch," a fabrication born from human need. More likely, I believe, our vulnerability opens our eyes to many realities we weren't able to see before. A time of personal trial opens our ears to better hear God's consistent message, as spoken to Isaiah: "Fear not, for I am with you. Do not be frightened, for I am your God."

Rabbi Fishman: I was always taught that when someone writes that they are not afraid, it is usually a sign they're trying to supress their fear. Yet this is a comfort for me. A person of faith continues to live life notwithstanding hesitations about what tomorrow may bring.

This is how I understand the concept of living in a relationship with God. Not that a supreme power takes away all doubts and uncertainties, but rather that God allows us the companionship. As we struggle to find our way through life's rough waters, we know we are never alone.

Rabbi Splansky: Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik admits: "I know that I am perplexed, that my fears are irrational, incoherent. At times I am given over to panic; I am afraid of death… I don't know [even] what to fear, what not to fear; I am utterly confused and ignorant." But when a psychiatrist who deemed all fears to be unhealthy asked Rabbi Soloveitchik if the concept of yirat HaShem (fear of God) should be omitted from the High Holiday prayer book, he answered: "I am not a psychiatrist, but I know that fear is a part of being human. Everyone has fears – fear of failure, fear of rejection, fear of loss of wealth, of health, of life itself. There is, however, one great fear that pushes away all the other smaller fears. What is that fear? It is fear of the Holy One, Blessed be God."

I know many good people who would say of themselves, as did Sigmund Freud, "I am resigned to the fact that I am a God-forsaken non-believing Jew." But if "Do not be afraid" is a mitzvah, we must take up the challenge to consider how to fulfil it. How might I hold these words in my hands? And how might these words hold me? How might they place me in God's hands?

Rabbi Fishman: The first word of the Ten Commandments is "Anochi" ("I am"). The 19th-century chassidic Rebbe of Ishbitz commented that "I" in Hebrew can be written as "Ani" or "Anochi." The one-letter difference between them is the kaf, which in Hebrew means "like" or "as if."

In the very moment of revelation, we were introduced to a God who still was only showing us a small sense of who He is. We can never really know God. Our understanding of so much in our world will always be incomplete. Even when we think we may know something, there are still gaps.

Belief in God doesn't mean always having the answers, but living with the questions. This, too, is Jewish faith, and it is the most authentic approach I know. ■

Throughout the first half of the 20th century, low wages, long hours, and hazardous working conditions were the norm for many working class Jews. It was an era when Spadina Avenue was the focal point of Jewish working class life; and when striking was a common part of the working class experience. This photograph shows a man striking for a group affiliated with the Ontario Poultry Buyers in 1939 in Toronto's Kensington Market.

Probing the Jewish approach to physician-assisted death

In a December CJN cover story, Barbara Silverstein wrote about the intersection of Jewish law and physician-assisted death (PAD). At the time, Quebec had already adopted a law legalizing PAD, and the Supreme Court of Canada was preparing to issue its own ruling on the matter. Now that the court has struck down the ban on PAD in a unanimous decision, it seems appropriate to revisit Silverstein's findings.

According to Jewish law, her piece explains, there appears to be no room for discussion on the legality of PAD: the answer is a resounding "no," and two rabbis quoted by Silverstein make that abundantly clear. Rabbi Ronald Weiss, the director of chaplaincy services at Jewish Family & Child in Toronto, tells Silverstein, "It's murder to help someone die… Judaism teaches that every moment of life is precious and of infinite value." Rabbi Michael Dolgin, spiritual leader of Toronto's Temple Sinai, puts it even more bluntly: "From a Jewish perspective, we can't even talk about it."

But even if there's no denying that the Torah and generations of religious lawmakers have traditionally stood against physician-assisted death, Silverstein suggests there might be more to the story. Some argue that the Judaism of the 21st century should take into account the same social, cultural, and medical trends that contributed to the Supreme Court's decision to overturn its own ban on PAD. In the 21 years since the court last ruled on the subject, public opinion has changed dramatically, and the new decision clearly reflects that reality. Perhaps the Jewish approach to PAD should, too.

Indeed, while he affirmed Judaism's traditional legal consensus against PAD, Rabbi Dolgin added "but that finality is an inadequate Jewish response," especially given the advances of modern medicine. "There are many situations now where people's existence is extended to a point that we must ask if we are extending life or if we are extending suffering?" he asks Silverstein. "When there is no hope of recovery and extending the pain amounts to suffering, it's a valid Jewish legal and ethical question to ask whether trying to extend that situation as many minutes and seconds as possible is the right Jewish response."

Still, some argue an official Jewish alternative to PAD already exists. Baycrest's Dr. Michael Gordon, a CJN columnist, tells Silverstein "that good palliative care within the scope of medical practice can alleviate much of a patient's suffering and is in accordance with Jewish law." If the Jewish thing is to encourage life, not death, PAD legislation could promote the exact opposite. By that account, physician-assisted death makes "it too easy for people with severe disabilities to give up on living when they could have productive lives," Montreal's Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz argues in Silverstein's piece.

PAD will soon be legal in Canada, but for many Jewish Canadians, and many of their religious fellow citizens, there's another set of laws to consider, and the law of the land and the law of God appear out of sync in this case. As Silverstein's piece hints, though, there may be more than one Jewish approach to PAD. Death is absolute, but religion might not have to be. ■ — YONI

Jewish education without borders

Seymour Epstein

Recently there has been renewed interest in the Pew Research Center's 2013 study, A Portrait of Jewish Americans. Most of this is due to an article published on Nov 2, 2014 by Jack Wertheimer, a historian of American Jewry, and Steven M. Cohen, a sociologist of the same domain. They re-analyzed the findings and raised an alarm to the American Jewish Diaspora regarding what they consider to be the more threatening implications of the statistics.

One of the points they emphasized is that Jews can no longer brag about their high regard for family life and family values. The statistics show that many non-Orthodox young Jews are not marrying and that the fertility rate among non-Orthodox Jews is 1.7, a statistic very distant from the 2.1 required for growth. I share their sense of alarm, not only for American Jewry, but within our Canadian communities as well.

Soon after the Pew study was released I wrote an article in this newspaper relating the U.S. statistics to the Canadian scene. While there is significant history that makes us somewhat different than our American co-religionists, there is no reason for us to be complacent.

Pew points to a significant 32 per cent of Jews born after 1980 who see themselves as Jews but not by religion. This is a 70 per cent increase in that category from a study in 1990 while the population only increased by 25 per cent. They may define themselves differently, but they are not living a significant form of Jewish life and their children will be mostly lost to the Jewish people.

Whether they are native Jews, Russians or Israelis, their loss is an unacceptable tragedy on two grounds. One, we are too tiny a people to suffer a loss of such magnitude. Two, there is no reason for them to be cheated out of a rich heritage that belongs to them, just because the current modes of Jewish life do not resonate with them.

There is a need for a new form of Jewish education fashioned for the 21st century which will boldly teach and learn without reference to past and current denominational lines, nor with reference to the religious/secular divide – Jewish Education Without Borders.

While traditional Jewish teaching must continue formally and informally, for children and adults, in the existing institutions of Jewish life (indeed, it must be intensified to combat the illiteracy that is rampant even at the centre), a creative challenge exists to establish and nurture truly pluralistic educators who can stand proud in their own beliefs and yet be open to new Jewish portals that will appeal to those who are now indifferent, distant, or disaffected.

Jewish literacy is life-critical to a creative future that adapts Judaism to the challenges of every age. Our strength has always been our ability to adapt. We transformed ourselves from an enslaved people to landowners in Canaan. We turned a Babylonian captivity into a learned Jewish community that flourished in Iraq for centuries. Once the Second Temple was destroyed, we changed from a central sacrificial cult based in Israel into a religion practised locally in thousands of communities around the world. And after the destruction of European Jewry in the Shoah, we built the "Start-Up Nation."

Behind every one of these transformations were Jewish consciences filled with values, texts, and a sense of historical destiny. Even when we were challenged intellectually, culturally, and politically by the enlightenment, our varied responses were based on profound knowledge of our sources. Even those who rejected the traditions knew what they were leaving behind.

The Jews of Israel have already ventured into the domain of pluralist education by creating centres of Jewish learning which do not have a religious base and which attract students and teachers from a variety of different camps. Here in North America we have some centres of pluralist education. Academic Jewish studies at universities, community schools and camps, and some communal programs are functioning in the right direction. But much more is needed for all ages.

Jewish leaders must first recognize the problem by pro-actively searching for Jews on the periphery and listening to their voices. This process is the opposite of kiruv, the technique used by the Orthodox to attract new adherents to traditional Judaism. Whether it works or not for the Orthodox is a question, but it is not what is required for the population I have described.

The goal of Jewish Education Without Borders is not to attract distant Jews to institutions they do not respect, but rather to help them find new modes of Jewish life that are meaningful to them. North American Jewish life was built by immigrants and it became the most powerful Diaspora in Jewish history. Its great institutions, movements, and organizations were designed for Jews who mostly no longer exist. And they were designed new and fresh to meet the cultural, spiritual, and communal needs of those early generations in North America. The future, if there is to be one, must be built with the same creativity and sense of destiny that created the Jewish life we were raised on. But, new yet-to-be-built domiciles of Jewish life and fresh paths we have not yet paved will form that future.

Do I honestly believe that a Judaism severed from the traditions of belief and ritual has any long-range future? I doubt it, believing Jew that I am, but the modern age has given us a variety of Jewish lifestyles and we dare not give up on thousands of Jews who are disappearing. They must find their own portals and those gates will not necessarily look like ours. A new kind of Jewish teacher must exist to help them via Jewish literacy. Jewish education has always been the strategic plan of the Jewish people. The goal for all of us is pride and courage; pride in the Jewish achievements of the past and courage to work together towards a creative future.

I was recently asked: "If we build it will they come?" My answer: "If we build it they will not come, but if they build it, some will come." ■

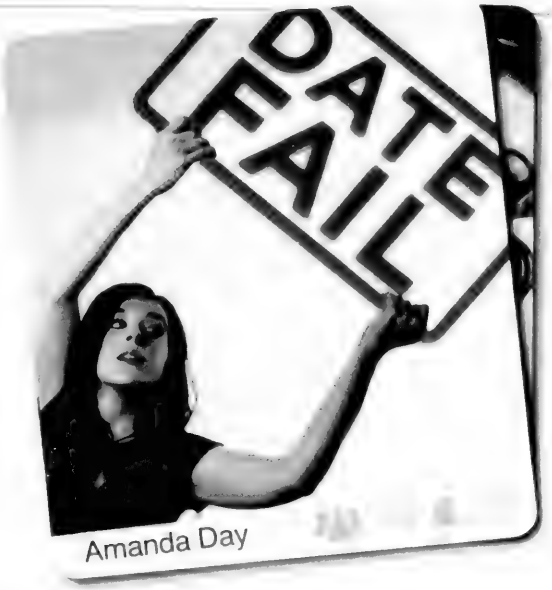
Will 'hook-up' apps replace matchmakers?



Amanda Day

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

There is no shortage of online dating sites that aim to capitalize on people's desire to find a mate and live happily ever after.

From Plenty of Fish to Gluten-Free Singles and everything in between, over the past 10 years, online dating has gone from being a shameful last resort to a necessary evil.

The latest online dating fads are smartphone apps called Tinder and its Jewish version, JSwipe.

Both are free, mobile apps that users download to their phones. Based on little more than a few of your cutest pictures, a couple of lines about what you're looking for, and your physical proximity to potential mates in the area, users swipe right if they like what they see, left if they don't. If two people swipe right on each other's profiles, a match is made and they're free to begin chatting.

Perhaps it has never been easier to meet people, but Orna Serruya, a Toronto-based matchmaker for Jews who are keen to settle down with a Jewish partner, said those who are serious about finding a spouse shouldn't be wasting time on dating apps.

"I feel like the people on those sites are looking to have fun, hook up. I don't know if they are all single. I'm wary of them. If people are on there, I'm not sure it is the right vehicle for them to find their potential bashert," said Serruya, who has about 1,000 clients in Toronto, Montreal, Miami, Los Angeles and Israel through her matchmaking service called The O Network.

Specializing in matches for modern Orthodox Jews, as well as a few clients who are ultra-Orthodox, and others who are secular, Serruya said she tries to make matches based on at least five things they have in common, as well as religious status and culture.

Since she started her network two years ago, people have been sending her names "non-stop" and it has grown.

"What I'm doing is personalized. If you're really looking to find the right one, it's the only way to go," Serruya said.

Angie (not her real name), a 25-year-old Israeli-born online dater who works in the film industry, understands why someone would brush Tinder off as nothing more than a hook-up app, but when it comes to apps like JSwipe that cater to Jews looking to match with other Jews, users are likely more serious about finding a mate.

"My theory is that people on JSwipe probably are more serious. If you're on JSwipe or JDate, I'm assuming it's because ending up with a Jew is important to you. I doubt religion would matter to someone who's just looking for something casual. When you use Jswipe instead of Tinder, you're essentially limiting your options. I don't know why someone would do that if they aren't interested in something more serious and long-term," Angie said.

Still, Serruya said, if people are serious about settling down, matchmaking is the way to go.

"You can get lucky, and you can find someone of quality on there. There are good people. My brother is on the site, and he is a good guy. So if someone were to find him, they'd score. So I can't generalize and say they're all bad. But I would say nine times out of 10, you're better off with a matchmaker who will find someone who is 90 per cent of what you're looking for," she said.

She suggested that the reason people are having a hard time settling down is because society promotes the concept of instant gratification.

"People used to commit and they committed for life. Now, if you commit, and something doesn't work, well, goodbye. It's so easy to leave."

Angie, who downloaded Tinder in 2013, understands that argument.

"These apps are definitely not benefiting our generation's FOMO [fear of missing out] culture. That's the downside of having such a large pool of people who are presumably single. You're always thinking someone better could come along with the next swipe," she said.

Amanda Day, a 31-year-old Toronto-based comedian who uses online dating sites and apps, also recognizes the downside to the modern dating culture.

"It's so easy to get distracted by someone else. You could be talking to someone meaningfully for a while and then you could be talking to someone else and that conversation falls completely to the wayside. And it's not that you weren't interested, or that you didn't want to go out with them, but it's just that there is a lot of stuff thrown at you. There are just so many options out there," Day said.

David (also not his real name), 33, who has been single for more than three years, said he downloaded Tinder, not to find "the one," but to learn more about the latest dating phenomenon.

"I'm more interested in the psychology aspect. To me, this is more of a social experiment than taking it very seriously. Unfortunately there are some girls who take it very seriously," he said, adding that women who are looking for love and marriage on Tinder are "delusional."

He said when people are on Tinder trying to find meaningful relationships that end in marriage, "they come off as being desperate and pathetic."

Perhaps David's approach to Tinder explains why the apps are viewed as little more than a way to find casual sex partners, and why both Angie and Day, and countless other women, are often subjected to crass, sexually driven opening lines.

"It wasn't long before I started receiving really creepy and inappropriate messages from men," said Angie, who has since started a blog called Tinder's Finest Bachelors to expose some of the shocking exchanges that are commonplace on Tinder.

Grandparents might be the antidote in vaccination debate

The recent outbreak of measles in California, which has now spread to other American states, and the simultaneous finding of cases in Toronto is a stark reminder of the inherent risk to our children of the ill-informed anti-vaccine movement.

Canada last year witnessed an enormous outbreak of measles with hundreds of cases primarily, but not exclusively, in Western Canada, with the majority occurring in non-immunized children. The current outbreak in the United States is also mainly among non-immunized or under-immunized young children (those who did not complete the recommended course of immunizations, which is a two-step process). The regimen according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) is as follows: "To prevent measles, children (and some adults) should be vaccinated with the measles, mumps, and rubella (MMR) vaccine. Two doses of this vaccine are needed for complete protection. Children should be given the first dose of MMR vaccine at 12 to 15 months of age. The second dose can be given four weeks later, but is usually given before the start of kindergarten at four to six years of age." Some adults may need a booster as well, because immunity may eventually wane.

Grandparents can be an important source of historical perspective on the compelling need for vaccination: they're often the only ones who have a living memory of what life was like and what the effects of childhood infectious disease was prior to the introduction of vaccination programs. I am a physician and a grandparent who recalls vividly the period prior to the advent, for example, of the polio vaccine. For most North Americans, polio is a distant memory, and parents who reject their children getting such a vaccine, as well as other commonly used and recommended vaccines, have no historical personal perspective on the effects of childhood infectious diseases.

I recall the polio outbreak that affected America in the early 1950s, when I was a young adolescent. In 1952, there were 59,000 cases of paralytic polio in the United States. Serious outbreaks occurred in all of the 48 states, as well as the territories of Alaska, Hawaii and Puerto Rico. A similar picture existed in Canada, where the disease peaked in 1953 with nearly 9,000 cases and 500 deaths.

I recall what it was like during those few years when parents worried about their children contracting the dreaded disease. There were newsreels in the movies showing vast wards with primarily children in iron lung machines, the only way to keep a child alive with severe paralysis until, with luck, there was some natural recovery from the disease. I still see elderly patients who were afflicted with polio and survived, but were left with life-long paralysis and often develop what is called post-polio syndrome in later years, which interferes seriously with normal function and may compromise life expectancy.

Our parents forbade us from swimming in public swimming pools, which for me, living in Brighton Beach in Brooklyn, N.Y., was a serious prohibition. Many children wore a slab of camphor tied to a string around their necks to ward off the disease. Of course, there was no evidence that this actually worked. Then in 1955, with the discovery of the Salk vaccine and massive population immunization, this scourge of childhood disease ended. It should be a thing of the past, but for those who reject such childhood vaccination for misguided reasons.

Grandparents are the only ones who can talk with authority and experience about the real face of childhood infectious outbreaks. It's incumbent upon our generation of seniors to use our influence and hopefully intrinsic respect to convince the vaccine naysayers of their misguided and potentially life-threatening anti-vaccine position and errant understanding of the science in contrast to their dangerous beliefs. ■

The unseen humanitarian face of Israel

Mordechai Ben-Dat

In its long, ongoing, often bloody struggle with the Palestinians, Israel has lost the propaganda battle. There is simply no other explanation for: the ugly anti-Israel demonstrations last summer throughout the capitals of Europe, the near total silence from western opinion makers and political elites to the Palestinians' accusations against the Jewish state in the International Criminal Court, the high-minded but biased and essentially immoral posturing against Israel in certain academic and journalistic circles, the results of opinion polls in Europe that cast Israel as among the most despised nations in the world, or the lingering popularity, especially on campuses in North America, of the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement. And of course, there are many more examples of anti-Israel behaviour that we could all cite.

We are no longer hoodwinked by the disingenuous attempts to distinguish anti-Israel from anti-Jewish. The singularly focused, cult-like obsession with Israeli transgressions – real and imagined – to the exclusion of other countries' missteps, long ago put paid to that false dichotomy.

But deeply felt, hard-core, anti-Jewish predispositions explain only part of the distressing anti-Israel attitudes. A great deal of the anti-Israel animus, especially among young adults, and increasingly, alas, among young Jewish adults, can be attributed simply to ignorance: to a lack of knowledge concerning the history of the conflict and to the current state of affairs in Israel and about Israel. The Jerusalem-based think-tank, The Jewish People Policy Institute, recently confirmed this observation when it noted "the conflict with the Palestinians puts Israel on the defensive internationally and has an [negative] impact on the views of younger Jews toward Israel."

What if our children were to read or see more than the usually slanted coverage of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians? What if they were also to read broader truths about Israel such as the Jewish state's profoundly humanitarian, deeply-etched footprint in the worldwide march to relieve suffering? Would their attitudes toward Israel be less negative?

The following is but a small number of recent stories concerning Israel that most of our young people did not read or see in the mainstream media. They are excerpted from the news website Israel21c.org.

• Five years after Haiti was devastated by an earthquake that killed some 230,000 people, Israelis are still on location helping rebuild lives and communities. Within 24 hours of the quake, Israel had sent a 220-person team of rescuers, disaster-management experts and medical personnel. IsraAID: The Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid is still operating there. Indeed, as IsraAID director Shachar Zahavi told Israel21C, "the organization is always one of the first relief groups to respond to disasters across the globe. Its policy is to stay on the ground to create and implement an infrastructure of programs to rehabilitate the affected community, leaving only once those programs are functioning in the hands of local residents trained by IsraAID. That's why you'll still find IsraAID workers in Japan, for example, nearly four years after a deadly earthquake and tsunami, and helping in Sierra Leone, South Sudan, Kenya, Uganda, the Philippines, China, Hong Kong and South Korea."

• Last month Israel pledged $8.75 million (US) – the largest per-capita investment by any nation — to the UN's Ebola Response Multi-Partner Fund, trying to combat the spread of the Ebola virus in West Africa. The donation was in addition to fully equipped medical clinics and medical specialists that Israel has sent.

• As the battle for the Syrian town of Kobani raged late last year, IsraAID assisted some 1,000 Christian and Yazidi families by sending 2,000 blankets, mattresses and food for 1,015 babies and young children.

This is only a very partial list of the humanitarian aid Israelis – health providers, engineers, agricultural experts, teachers and scientists – provide to a needy world. It is one of the many unseen positive facets of the complex society of the tiny, imperfect country. Too bad. ■

Tax evasion violates the laws of the Torah

Rabbi Jay Kelman

The most fundamental requirement of citizens in a democracy is payment of taxes due. Much of the reason Greece is in such dire economic straits is widespread tax evasion. As people often resent paying for services that others get for "free," tax evasion is most contagious, as otherwise honest people tend to join in cheating the system.

For Jews our civic duties are part of our religious obligations such that evading taxes is a violation not only of Canadian law but also of the laws of the Torah. Approximately 1,800 years ago the great talmudic sage, Shmuel (he was not ordained as a rabbi), formulated the religious principle that dina d'malchuta dina – the law of the land is the law. This was promulgated when taxes went to the "king's" coffers and not for public services. Nonetheless, a Jew was required to pay taxes irrespective of how the money was spent.

In a democracy, tax evasion is much more serious, as it involves stealing from the public. This stealing directly impacts on the quality of our lives, as evaded taxes cannot pay for education, health care, the military, research and development, arts and culture. Furthermore, those who cheat cause tax rates to be higher than they otherwise would be, thereby lowering the standard of living and curtailing consumer spending – the lifeblood of the economy.

I imagine many might be thinking that such a statement is going overboard, that such is the nature of democracy, and that since the problem can't really be solved, why fret over it? A recent report by the Taub Center for Social Policy Studies in Israel, should make us think again about the impact my "two cents" may have. They estimate that the underground economy represents approximately 20 per cent of the gross domestic product of Israel, twice the level of the United States. If this illegal and immoral economic activity could be cut in half, government revenue would increase by between 30 and 40 billion shekels, somewhere in the neighbourhood of $10 to 13 billion (Cdn).

Statistics Canada estimates that the underground economy here represents 2.3 per cent of GDP. While that seems trifling – and compared to Israel, it is – it represents a minimum of $15 billion of lost tax revenue. That is quite a bit of money for our political leaders to dangle before us in new programming or tax cuts as they vie for our votes in the upcoming election.

When one considers the huge budget fights in Israel, especially as they pertain to defence spending, tax evasion literally places the lives of Israelis and by extension Jews everywhere in danger. That is something to think about as you plan your next trip to Israel.

One of the unresolved and lingering debates in Israel regards the role Judaism can and should play in public life. As an Orthodox rabbi, I will state unequivocally that from a Torah perspective, ensuring our money is kosher is far more important than any food we may or may not eat. Israel would be a far more "religious" (can I say Jewish?) state if buses ran on Shabbat, soldiers could opt for non-kosher food, businesses operated on Shabbat, but all were able to answer with a resounding "yes" the question our sages teach will be the first we will be asked by God when our sojourn on this earth ends: "Were your business dealings conducted faithfully?" And this question applies whether one lives in Israel, Canada or, for that matter, Turkey.

Isaiah, the prophet of redemption, demands that the Jewish People be a "light unto the nations." He was not referring to our level of observance of Shabbat, kashrut and holidays when he proclaimed such. Rather he was referring to our integrity, compassion, sense of justice and sensitivity. As Isaiah himself says, "Zion shall be redeemed through justice and they that return with her with righteousness." These words are just as true today, if not more so, than they were when first uttered over 2,600 years ago. ■

Israeli film will hopefully get people talking about divorce

Norma Baumel Joseph

An Israeli film was nominated for this year's Golden Globe awards in the foreign film category. Even more amazing than a nomination of an Israeli film is its topic: Jewish divorce. Gett: The trial of Viviane Amsalem places this painful topic on the international scene. As far as I am concerned this is astonishing. No longer just a concern within part of the Jewish world, it is now a global topic. I am eager to see it and wait for the aftereffects.

The film did not win which I am sure is upsetting for Ronit and Shlomi Elkabetz, the directors and writers. But from my perspective, winning is not the issue. Rather this film has significance because it raises the tragedy of Jewish divorce and places it front and centre in the eyes of the world. The catastrophe that is the current state of Jewish divorce is shameful. This film should appropriately shame us.

In 1975 at a Montreal conference for professionals working on divorce, no one would concede to a national problem. The rabbis claimed there was no problem in Judaism. With all the denial, there was no movement toward solutions. In the general Jewish population there was almost total ignorance. Few knew that you even needed a Jewish divorce in addition to a civil one. No one knew the word agunah – a woman unable to get a Jewish divorce because her husband is either missing or recalcitrant.

I confess that while I was teaching about divorce, I did not know agunot (chained women) personally and did not know enough. These last 40 years I have learned a lot and heard all kinds of stories. Too much!

In the 1980s some of us had a private meeting with the then chief rabbi of Israel, Rabbi Meir Lau. We were trying to build agreement for a prenuptial agreement. As I explained about the mounting problem of agunot, he told me there was no problem. In his computer, he said, there were only four cases of women without a get. They were greedy women who would not just give their husbands money. It was just esseq, business, he claimed. He saw nothing wrong with establishing a process wherein women must pay their husbands for their legal rights. Nothing was wrong with the extortion that he was witnessing even enabling. Just greedy women messing with a good system! He was not the only rabbi to make this claim.

You can imagine my reaction.

The reaction was a worldwide campaign on the part of many women and men to publicize the problems and advocate for resolutions.

Slowly with a growing awareness some solutions were put forward. We in Canada amended the national divorce act. This law can be used to make sure neither partner uses Jewish law to restrain the other or to prevent the civil divorce from taking full effect. Many countries instituted similar laws. There is an increase in the usage of prenuptial agreements. These are not final solutions but involve greater consideration and responsiveness.

And while this is only a problem both within Orthodoxy and in Israel, the issue must affect all of us. This is not just a problem for the rabbis, though of course they must be directly involved. It applies to all of us, and not just when we are personally involved. When a Jew cries how can we not respond. When a Jewish woman cannot find justice, how can we sit idly by? When Jewish law is systemically untrustworthy, it is incumbent on all of us to repair it.

So what will the film accomplish? Hopefully, it will get people talking. There have been a number of good films recently addressing this problem. They all shine a much-needed light on the women. Films bring necessary attention that might yield reinterpreted laws. Attention is needed. Education is called for. Films on the world stage have incredible potential. Not simply to embarrass but to affect change. That is my goal. Always. ■

Child survivor to honour French family who saved him

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Leon Rucker has that rarity: an upbeat Holocaust story.

Though he was a hidden Jewish child during World War II, his memories are positive, even pleasant. Sheltered by a loving Catholic family in the French countryside, Rucker has no painful recollections of midnight knocks at the door, none of anguish at the possibility of being discovered and betrayed, and no memories of food shortages, deprivations and fear.

"I was treated very well, and I have wonderful memories of those times," said the soft-spoken 77-year-old Thornhill resident, a retired engineer and a founder of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

Even so, dangers persisted for the Langlois family, the French clan who sheltered the young Rucker on their farm in the tiny village of Néret, about 300 kilometres south of Paris, from 1942 to 1944.

That's why, on Feb. 17, members of the Langlois family will be designated Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust memorial and education centre.

Making the journey to Néret for the ceremony to honour his rescuers are Rucker, his wife Patricia (a former editor of The CJN), their son Simon and two granddaughters, one of whom, Shoshana, 10, is named for Suzanne Langlois, who effectively acted as a surrogate mother to Leon. Suzanne and her parents, Eugène and Alexandrine Langlois, are being honoured posthumously.

Accepting the honour on their behalf will be Gisèle Langlois Royer, now almost 90, Suzanne's last surviving sibling and the youngest of the Langlois' six children.

Rucker smiles when he says the ceremony is taking place in the village's "Salle des Fêtes," which was once the one-room schoolhouse he attended as a child.

Born in Paris in 1937, Rucker has faint memories of hearing air-raid sirens and seeing German soldiers, who marched into the French capital in June 1940. His father, Nathan, was a furrier and was married to Léa. The family enjoyed a comfortable life.

But France was split. The northern zone was Nazi-occupied, while the south, called Vichy, enacted harsh anti-Jewish laws. However, the southeastern city of Nice came under Italian control, which was far less oppressive. As a result, thousands of Jews took refuge there, including the Rucker family.

For two years, "we lived very peacefully" in Nice, Rucker says.

But things became tense when the Allies invaded North Africa in November 1942. "My parents knew that sooner or later, they would have to go into hiding."

By then, Leon's uncle had taken refuge in the village of Néret, but the local reeve refused more Jews. So the uncle asked a local family whether they could take in a little Jewish boy from Paris. They immediately agreed, and in late 1942, Suzanne Langlois arrived in Nice to collect five-year-old Leon.

Suzanne was unmarried and in her 30s. "I became like a son to her," Rucker recalls. He attended school and spent many happy days on the farm. "I kept my name. People didn't ask too many questions. If they asked, I was 'le petit Parisien.' Some of them might have known I was Jewish, but they didn't want to get involved. Most people were neutral."

As for the Langlois family, they were firmly on the political left, anti-clerical and opposed the Vichy regime. Leon was never passed off as a Catholic. They fed and clothed the lad, who kept in touch with his parents via mail. Leon remembers hearing the sound of bridges being blown up by the French Resistance.

The situation lasted until September 1944, when he was reunited with his parents, who had narrowly escaped deportation while living in Lyon. The family returned to Paris to find someone had occupied their apartment, which they were then forced to share. But Rucker's father became a currency trader on the black market, and the family prospered anew. However, all their relatives in Poland had perished in the Holocaust.

Rucker would return to the farm to visit the Langlois family regularly. In 1954, he came to Canada, where he met his wife, and they had three children.

Gisèle Langlois has no children. But members of the family still live in Néret (population 200) in the original farm compound, and a grandson still farms the Langlois land. A number of other grandchildren and great-grandchildren in the area plan to attend the ceremony.

The specially struck medal and certificate will be presented by a representative of the Israeli Embassy in Paris.

Rucker concedes he did not begin the work of having the Langlois family recognized as Righteous until only a few years ago because of other commitments. He also recognizes that his tale is different from those of most others who were hidden as children during the war.

"For me personally," he says, "it's a happy story." ■

Mixed-race Jews have JSwipe dating woes

DANIELLE KUBES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When Jenn Czobel downloaded JSwipe to her phone, she expected it to be like Tinder: a dating application where users choose to chat based on photos, geographical location, mutual friends and a short biography – except it's meant just for Jews, or those who fancy them.

What she didn't expect was to have zero matches. On Tinder, she has several hundred.

"I don't look like I'm Jewish, and the people on JSwipe are obviously on there to find someone with whom they share similar values," says the 28-year-old account manager from Toronto.

Czobel's mother is from Vietnam and her father is from Hungary, so she doesn't look like the majority of Jews in Toronto.

David Yarus, founder of JSwipe, thinks her religion should matter, not her race.

"What's peculiar, though, is that the profile says 'Jewish' or not. It says: 'Willing to convert,' 'Other,' 'Jewish,'" he says. "So if hers says 'Jewish,' it doesn't fully make sense to me."

In fact, Yarus thinks, as does popular culture (see: Priscilla Chan, wife of Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg), that her Asian features should be working in her favour, a reference to the stereotype that Jewish men are attracted to Asian women.

"That seems almost like the opposite of what I would ever think feasible to have happen. Because at the end of the day, this is, actually, potentially the dream situation for Jewish dudes: she's half-Asian and she's Jewish," he says. "So it should be that she's getting double the matches."

The truth is, most people prefer to date people of their own race, especially white people.

Research from the popular dating site OkCupid shows that white women in particular almost exclusively reply to messages from white men. White men, on the other hand, are much more open to dating women from different races, except for black women.

And although JSwipe specifies religion, not race, in its profiles, Judaism has always conflated the two.

That's because Judaism is not just a religion in the modern sense of the term. Rather, it also has a national and tribal component, as well as ethnic, cultural and even racial aspects.

But despite the fact our Israelite heritage, with its link to land and kin, has been diminished by centuries of dispersion and greater stress on the religious side of Judaism, it still seems that for anyone who's serious about being Jewish, a prospective mate should ideally meet all criteria – cultural, religious and racial.

And observant as a half-Asian Jew may be, would it ever be enough for most people in our community?

Geoff Grossman, a 29-year-old who is half-Chinese and half-Caucasian, explains that he was the only visible minority at his Toronto Hebrew school, "until my little sister started attending."

He uses both Tinder and JSwipe, but doesn't take either very seriously.

"I can't imagine just swiping. I used to live with a guy that used to swipe right [say yes to profiles, enabling the exchange of contact information] all the time, and it was a complete gutter system. I'm not like that."

He says the typical reaction he receives from Jewish girls on JSwipe is essentially, "'Why the hell are you on JSwipe? Your eyes are different,'" he says.

Tinder's pros and cons

"They'd say things that you wouldn't dare say to a person you just met at a bar – sexual things they wanted to do to me, called me derogatory names. I was really horrified at first and extremely offended, but then, as sad as it is, I learned to get used to these types of messages. I think most girls have as well. We've all gotten used to the fact that these types of messages just come with the territory of online dating."

Day also decided to publicize some of the vulgar messages men send her. She recently launched a podcast on SoundCloud and talkhole.co called Date Fail, which features discussions with other online daters about "sex/courtship/romance in our social media age."

"[Publicizing the sexual comments] has become such a big part of my online presence. When I post those messages, I get so much feedback from it."

Despite the downsides to online dating, Day said the positives outweigh the negatives.

"I like the way Tinder works, because of that initial attraction, seeing a picture and deciding if you're attracted to the person and taking it from there," she said.

"But before this, I wasn't getting a lot of dates. It was hard for me to meet up with people and have that connection. Now I don't have to worry about looking good at the grocery store. Now I can just go get my eggs."

Angie herself had a meaningful relationship with a man she met on Tinder and knows of many others who developed relationships through the app.

David said he does want to get married, but "the old-fashioned way."

"It'll happen the natural way. I'll find someone in my travels, or here, and hook up the good ol' fashioned way." ■

'Jew-balls' are an 'exercise in futility and painfulness'

Grossman says his online experience mirrors real life.

"I've done it a couple times, just to shoot myself in the foot – going to [the midtown Toronto pickup joint] Alleycatz or one of those Jew-balls, matzah-balls stuff," he says. "It's just an exercise in futility and painfulness."

Although many Jews – white, black or green – view such events as futile, painful and often requiring several overpriced tequila shots to endure, non-Caucasian Jews in our community face different challenges

"I have obviously met people at Jewish events, Jew-dos. But I think initially, they probably just think I'm tagging along with my Jewish friends," Czobel says.

"I think that once they find out that I'm Jewish, it puts me into a different category in their mind – a wife-able category." ■

Historian Gilbert spent war in Toronto as a child

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Martin Gilbert and Suzy Leizner

Judith Mandel, 75, was just a baby when Martin Gilbert, then about four years old, was temporarily taken in by her Toronto parents during World War II.

Gilbert, who later became an esteemed Jewish British historian and the biographer of Winston Churchill, died on Feb. 3 at the age of 78.

Mandel said Gilbert experienced a severe episode of heart arrhythmia in 2012 and that the deprivation of oxygen caused him to have a serious brain injury. He ultimately died of an infection.

Known throughout his life as a passionate Zionist, advocate for Soviet Jews and chronicler of the Holocaust, Gilbert was born in London, England, in 1936 and, nine months into the war, was evacuated to Canada as part of the British effort to safeguard children from German bomb attacks.

Gilbert was sent to Toronto with his aunt in the summer of 1940, and it was arranged by what Mandel said was the then-equivalent of Jewish Family & Child for him to live with Mandel's parents, Ida and Harry Leizner, at their Palmerston Avenue home.

He stayed for three years with the Leizners – who were members of Holy Blossom Temple and had two children, Judith and her younger sister, Suzy – before returning to his family in London in May 1944.

Mandel's father was a family doctor whose office was on the bottom floor of the family home, and her mother supervised a nursery school and in the summers ran a children's overnight camp near Barrie, Ont., attended mostly by Jewish children.

"My mother would have had a lot of sympathy for any child in need of care," said Mandel, who now lives in north Toronto and has three adult children, explaining why she believes her parents took Gilbert in. "That was just her – she was a very child-focused person."

She added: "When Martin got back to London, he was sent off fairly soon by his parents to boarding school. My mother found that horrifying, to have a child who had been taken from his family at age four get back to his family and then be sent away to boarding school."

While her own memories of Gilbert as a child are vague, Mandel said her mother spoke a lot about him as the years went on, and the two kept up a strong correspondence. "My mother always talked about him as being a really bright kid and not playing around the way other kids played," Mandel recalled. "When he became an adult, they corresponded a lot. She was very proud of him. She watched everything he did, and they wrote letters to each other."

Although there was what Mandel called a "gap" in her own personal correspondence with Gilbert, when she was in her 40s, she reconnected with him, and the two forged an adult friendship that lasted until Gilbert's death last week.

"He came to Toronto several times, and my husband and I would attend his lectures. His schedule was very complete, but we'd always manage to find some time to see him, to go for dinner," Mandel said. "My husband, Raymond, was a Polish Holocaust survivor, so the two of them would have a lot of discussions about that."

Gilbert published 88 works that dealt largely with the two world wars, the Holocaust and Israel. He studied and taught at Oxford University.

In 1962, he began working on a biography of Winston Churchill, helping Churchill's son, Randolph, with the project. After Randolph passed away, in 1968, Gilbert took over the endeavour and added six volumes to the two existing ones. Subsequently, in 2007, he wrote a book called Churchill and the Jews: A Lifelong Friendship. In 1990, he was made a commander of the British Empire and, in 1995, he was knighted.

Gilbert loved Israel, Mandel said, noting that he had a second home in the hills of Jerusalem, where he spent much of his time.

Mandel's impression of Gilbert was that he was "a very caring person, super intelligent... When you got to know him, he was very easy to know."

In 2003, Mandel's daughter Ruth wrote a book about the plight of Jewish child Holocaust survivors called How to Tell Your Children about the Holocaust, for which Martin wrote the forward.

Two summers ago, Mandel visited Gilbert in hospital in London and said he was very sick and barely able to communicate.

"It was very sad to see somebody so highly communicative, and such a wordsmith, not be able to talk."

Gilbert leaves behind his third wife, Esther Goldberg, whom he married in 2005, and three children, Natalie, David and Joshua. ■

Baycrest Health Sciences recognizes the contributions of

Joseph Rotman z'l
1935 - 2015

The Baycrest Health Sciences family was deeply saddened to learn of the recent death of Joe Rotman.

Joe was a giant asset to Canada. His passing leaves a tremendous humanitarian and philanthropic void across both the Baycrest community and the community at large.

Joe's business acumen and contributions to our institutions of higher learning and healthcare research will be legendary. He set a unique standard of personal commitment and giving that is now emulated across the nation. Through his vision, he challenged and positioned a number of organizations to aspire to and attain global recognition as leaders, Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute among them.

Joe was an inspiration and a fabulous source of mentorship advice and support, as well as an ardent supporter of the Baycrest vision. He was a transformative leader for our organization. His presence, support and generosity of spirit will be missed, but his impact on the field of brain health and aging will be felt for generations to come.

All of us at Baycrest express our heartfelt condolences to Joseph's wife Sandra, their children Janis, Kenneth and Amy, and the entire Rotman family.

May his memory be a blessing to all who had the honour and good fortune of knowing him.

Jewish groups laud outgoing foreign minister

Representatives from Jewish groups and the Israeli government praised outgoing foreign minister John Baird for his close ties to the Jewish community and his robust support for Israel after his surprise announcement Feb. 3 that he is resigning from cabinet and leaving federal politics.

As foreign minister, he was noted for his clear articulation of his Conservative government's policy on Israel, a position that's not expected to change under his successor, who was not immediately announced.

Israeli ambassador Rafael Barak thanked Baird "for his contribution to [the] special friendship" shared by Canada and Israel.

"As foreign minister, Mr. Baird has been a rare beacon of light at a very dark chapter in world history. His principled positions, guided by the values of the Canadian people, have served as a pillar of strength for all liberal democracies," Barak said.

"For the people of Israel, who live in the only liberal democracy in the Middle East, Mr. Baird's vocal support has been an empowering force against the rise of fundamentalism and tyranny on our borders," Barak added.

Barak noted that Baird was a frequent visitor to the Jewish state, including a visit last month in which several agreements were concluded furthering "the Canada-Israel strategic partnership."

Just prior to Baird's trip, the Palestinian Authority brought war crimes charges against Israel at the International Criminal Court in The Hague and continued to seek sanctions at the UN. In December, Canada voted against the Palestinian statehood proposal introduced at the UN Security Council.

Baird said these moves by the Palestinians "will not contribute to peace and security in the region" and he said Canada would help "defend Israel from international attempts to delegitimize it."

During his latest trip to the region, Palestinian protesters threw shoes and eggs at Baird in Ramallah after he met with his Palestinian counterpart.

Baird, 45, has been involved in Conservative politics for most of his adult life. At 26, he was elected an MPP in the Progressive Conservative government of former Ontario premier Mike Harris. He was elected MP for Ottawa-West Nepean in 2006. After serving in a number of other ministerial portfolios, he became foreign minister in May 2011.

One academic who monitors the Canadian political scene said under the stewardship of Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Baird, the Tories have made inroads among traditionally Liberal Jewish voters.

Nelson Wiseman, professor of political science at the University of Toronto, said the government's pro-Israel policy has been an important factor in that. There is some electoral benefit in backing Israel in the few ridings with a large Jewish presence. But that doesn't fully explain the strong pro-Israel position of this government, he said.

"It is a principled position," Wiseman said. "They are courting the vote, but we should not be so cynical as to believe the only reason they're adopting this position is that they're courting the vote."

Foreign policy, he continued, barely registers among Canadian voters, who are more interested in pocketbook issues such as the economy and taxes.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said that as foreign affairs minister, "Baird deserves immense credit for advancing Canada's core principles on the world stage in a wide range of policy areas – from human rights in Africa, to Iranian nuclear proliferation, to Russia's aggression in Ukraine."

As "a steadfast friend of both Canada's Jewish community and Israel, Minister Baird played a unique and significant role in strengthening the Canada-Israel relationship. In doing so, he affirmed the shared democratic values that underpin ties between Canadians and Israelis," Fogel said.

The Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) thanked Baird "for his unwavering support of Israel" and "his firm stance against anti-Semitism."

Last year, Baird received the FSWC's Award of Valour, given to "those who actively uphold the principals of tolerance, social justice and Canadian democratic values."

Michael Mostyn, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada, said that Baird "is an outstanding individual of the highest integrity who always made time for the community. He was a strong minister who pushed through many important agenda items."

Efforts to reach JSpace Canada and Canadian Friends of Peace Now for comment were unsuccessful. ■

New management expected to rescue Island Yacht Club

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The Island Yacht Club (IYC) has a new lease on life.

On Feb. 5, members voted nearly unanimously to approve an agreement that will see the storied yacht club turn the management reins over to Blockhouse Bay Management Company.

The move will avert a looming bankruptcy, as the club struggled to pay ongoing expenses and meet mounting debt that now stands at $1.6 million, said IYC Commodore William Kassel.

"I'm thrilled everything is moving forward. I think it will be bigger and better than ever," said Kassel, a member of the club since 1973.

Over the years, the IYC has lost members to other boating clubs. The club suffered a body blow in 2004 when a fire destroyed the clubhouse and members looked elsewhere for their boating needs. More than half the members left at the time.

Currently, the club has 43 boats but 120 slips, leading to a shortfall in funds to pay fixed costs, such as rent and taxes.

"We would have been bankrupt and the club would not exist. We were getting really close to it," Kassel said. "We were great boaters, but terrible managers."

Blockhouse Bay was recently incorporated by the people who own the Toronto Island Marina, Bill Duron, Gary Lovas and Carl Lovas. Duron is CEO of the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair.

Duron and his partners have a proven track record in operating boating clubs, Kassel said. They turned around the fortunes of the Toronto Island Marina, which like the IYC had more slips than boats. Today the Marina has a waiting list for its 330 slips.

Under terms of the new agreement, Blockhouse Bay will invest $1 million in the IYC. The IYC's 43 boating members will each commit $5,000 to the club while the 12 social members will contribute $1,500 each.

Kassel expects Blockhouse will solicit new members immediately, likely from the Toronto Island Marina's waiting list. Currently the IYC is the only club in Toronto's inner harbour with available slips, he said.

Blockhouse will take over management of the clubhouse restaurant, as well as the docks, summer and winter storage and the tender service.

It will upgrade the existing fixed docks and turn them into floating docks, making them more convenient for members, and upgrade the electrical service.

Still to be determined are the new membership categories and fees. However, current members will experience lower membership fees this year as well as reduced tender charges. Docking fees are expected to rise by four per cent, Kassel said.

With a restructuring of debt, which has been approved by the club's bank and debenture holders, approval by the City of Toronto, the club's landlord, new management and an expected growth in membership, the IYC should return to financial viability, Kassel said.

"They're going to restore us to the glory we had in the past," he added.

The IYC was founded in 1951 on Mugg's Island for Jewish boaters who were excluded from gentile sailing clubs.

The club began with 15 to 20 members, and grew at one point to 350 members.

Prior to the fire, IYC boasted 110 boating members and 40 social members (based on family units), or about 300 to 400 people in all. In 2012, when the club celebrated its 60th anniversary "on the lake," the club had 80 boating members and 25 social members. ■

Danforth shul holds interfaith Tu b'Shvat seder

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Rev. Robin Wardlaw, left, of Glen Rhodes United Church and Rev. Sarah Miller, right, of Eastminster United Church with Rabbi Miriam Margles, centre, spiritual leader of the Danforth Jewish Circle

The mood of a multifaith Tu b'Shvat celebration was upbeat and congenial as a group of people from diverse backgrounds and faiths shared their reverence for the beauty and bounty of the earth.

Some 60 people from Jewish, Muslim and Christian congregations gathered Feb. 3 at Eastminster United Church on Danforth Avenue to attend a Tu b'Shvat seder conducted by Rabbi Miriam Margles, spiritual leader of the Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC).

The community event was organized by the Danforth Multi-Faith Committee, made up of representatives from the DJC, Eastminster, the Pakistani Community Centre, Glen Rhodes United Church, Neighbourhood Unitarian/ Universal Congregation and the Ethiopian Church.

Karen Robbins of the DJC, a co-chair of the committee, co-founded the group in 2007 with Eve-Lynn Stein of the DJC and Tasleem Riaz of the Pakistani Community Centre. Members of the Pakistani centre pray at Madinah Masjid, the mosque at Danforth and Donlands avenues. The group rents space at Glen Rhodes, which is at Gerrard Street and Coxwell Avenue.

Robbins said the goal of these multifaith events is to strengthen community ties. "There are no politics. We're all about community-building. We meet in each other's homes.

"For me it is about spending time together. We want to get to know each other. We want to be in each other's lives."

Over the years, the committee has held several events – community walks, women's evenings and a cricket match last spring. "This year we decided to participate in each other's calendar events," Robbins said, noting that Rabbi Margles suggested the DJC host a multifaith celebration for Tu b'Shvat, the New Year of Trees.

The rabbi told The CJN that an important theme of Tu b'Shvat – gratitude for the abundance of nature – presented an opportunity for people "to bring the wisdom of their own respective traditions" in sharing an appreciation for the environment and its sustainability.

"It's so valuable for people from different cultures and from different religious communities to spend time together engaging in how a particular practice touches a universal theme, particularly in relationship to the environment."

The rabbi and DJC Cantor Lisa Kent led participants at the seder in prayer and songs. People recited the Hebrew blessings for the wine and the fruit of the trees as they sampled grape juice, olives, figs, dates, pomegranates, almonds and walnuts, all symbolizing many of the species mentioned in the Bible.

There was even a Canadian twist to the Tu b'Shvat menu: maple syrup was added to represent this nation's iconic tree.

In between fruit courses and blessings, people crossed the room, greeting each other with shalom or salaam and handshakes, and later they talked to each other about cultural traditions, including food.

In one exercise, the rabbi had participants forming human chains, and in another, people exchanged partners, moving around the room as if they were square dancing.

Two members of the United Church clergy were on hand. Rev. Sarah Miller from Eastminster and Rev. Robin Wardlaw of Glen Rhodes each read a poem to the group.

When asked about the event, both of them were very positive.

"I though it was a beautiful celebration of community," Rev. Miller said.

Rev. Wardlaw noted the "gracious tone of the evening" and diversity of the group. "The breadth of participants – there were people from all over the world."

Yafet Tadesse of the Ethiopian Church likened the event to the changing of the seasons. "We are ushering in a new season of acceptance."

Rafaqat Ali Malik, who participated as both a member of the Pakistani Community Centre and a representative of Asian Communities Council of Canada, said the evening had transcended the barriers of "colour and creed."

For Robbins, the seder was a great success. "I felt it was a real opportunity for connecting. People were really talking to each other. The goodwill was palpable.

"Rabbi Miriam was excellent in navigating us to a space that was open for everyone to feel love for the earth and nature. We could share that no matter what our backgrounds." ■

Raif to get black history award

plungen@thecjn.ca

Back in 1978, while he was serving as a consul within the Israeli trade delegation to Toronto, Arie Raif helped organize a joint program in which Israeli and Egyptian diplomats greeted a Jewish mission on its way to visit both countries in the Middle East.

It was the first such joint effort and it preceded the Israeli-Egypt peace treaty by six months. It was also one of the many achievements cited by the Toronto Police Service (TPS) in presenting Raif with its 15th Black History Month Award.

"This award is designed to recognize police officer, fire and EMS personnel, soldiers, corrections offices, school boards and members of the community for a 'job well done,'" states a letter from Supt. Scott Baptist of the TPS.

The award will be presented on Feb. 22 at the British Methodist Episcopal Church, which is partnering with the police service in granting the award.

"I am very honoured. I am very proud," said Raif.

Raif, a businessman who also serves as CEO of both the Canadian Peres Centre for Peace and of the Canadian Friends of Meir Hospital, said the award recognizes his efforts to establishing "understanding and co-operation among people in the Middle East."

In announcing Raif as recipient of the Black History Month Community Award Celebration, the TPS described Raif as possessing "great humanitarian passion, boundless energy, irrepressible sense of humour," and it called him "an incurable optimist."

It added: "He always demonstrates a forthright approach and is never easily discouraged."

Ojo Tewogbade, a member of the award selection committee, said Raif had been recommended by George Marcello, CEO of the Step By Step Organ Transplant Association. Raif is a member of the organization's board.

Tewogbade looked into the nomination and agreed that Raif's community involvement warranted granting him the award.

Tewogbade, who retired from the Toronto police after 35 years of service, said the award is not limited to black people but is given to anyone in the community who meets the criteria for volunteerism and "a job well done." ■

The Jan. 29 article about the exhibit in Winnipeg of photos from the Lodz Ghetto ("Jewish, Polish communities partner in remembrance") contained several errors. The exhibit was first shown in Canada at York University in 2013. It was sponsored by York's Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies and its Mark and Gail Appel Program for Holocaust and Anti-Racism Education, and the Azrieli Foundation. It was hosted by Osgoode Hall Law School at York. The exhibit was originally funded by a grant from the foreign office of the Federal Republic of Germany. The curating was by the Topography of Terror Foundation in Berlin, which has focused on education about Nazi Germany and the Holocaust since its opening in 1987.

Teen with Down syndrome sings her heart out in video

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Toronto teen Madison Tevlin, who was born with Down syndrome, has captured hearts worldwide with her rendition of John Legend's All of Me.

As a John Legend fan, Madison, 13, chose to sing the song because it reminded her of love and her family.

The video was produced last summer when Madison was still 12 with the help of her vocal coach Marla Joy, Toronto producer Jody Litvack and pianist Kibwe Thomas.

Madison was hesitant to make the video because she had a sinus infection on the recording date, but, like a true professional, she told her family, "I am going to go with the flow. A singer has to sing."

On Jan. 20, the family uploaded the video to YouTube, along with a running script highlighting obstacles faced by people with Down syndrome, for their friends and family to appreciate.

"Madison is singing her heart out, defying all the stats," Joy said.

The outpouring of support for Madison's passionate performance exploded, with more than five million views and counting.

Madison, left, with siblings Jonny and Zoie

Its success was accelerated by a tweet from actor Ashton Kutcher: "Only a few people with Down syndrome are able to sing. Little Madison defies all odds with her new song. Down syndrome does not define a person."

Madison wants everyone to know that Down syndrome does not define her.

"If I can do it, others can do it. I want others to see they can, too. If you love it, you do it," she said.

"We're glad that people are 'seeing the ability' of people with Down syndrome and that Madison has shared her talents and gifts with other people. She is quite the inspiration and a very talented person," said Kaitlyn Pecson, design and communications manager at the Canadian Down Syndrome Society.

Madison has been enjoying music from an early age and singing all her life.

"I think the level of Madison's speech and ability to express herself both vocally and physically with feeling has taken a lot of people by surprise and has truly done what Madison asked, which is to inspire and offer hope to people," said her father, Matthew Tevlin.

Madison trains in the studio with her voice coach once a week for one hour.

"I have never seen a girl who loves to sing and loves music more in my life. She has really low muscle tone. It is hard for her to push it down and to keep it on one note, because it takes double the energy," Joy said.

The family is receiving personal notes from people around the world, including Australia, the United Kingdom, the United States, the Philippines and South America.

Madison's 11-year-old sister Zoie has also been supportive. With a shared love of music and dance, Zoie is responsible for setting up and running Madison's social media page.

The budding star plans to continue singing and making videos. "If there were more resources like Madison's video, then maybe we can change the way people look at children with Down syndrome or any special needs," said her mother, Grace Tevlin. ■

Yachad celebrates 30 years helping special needs people

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Yachad, the National Jewish Council for Disabilities, is celebrating 30 years of advocating for Jewish children and adults with special needs and creating a place for them within the Jewish community.

"Our mission is inclusion of special needs into the mainstream society, and we feel they should be allowed access and encouraged to be included in anything that has to do with Jewish organizations of any kind," said Devorah Marmer, the director of Yachad's Toronto chapter.

Yachad, Hebrew for together, has 17 chapters in Canada, the United States and Israel that offer people with special needs opportunities to take part in events and programs.

"We provide educational and social recreational programs for children and adults with special needs... We have peers, high school students or university students who do programs together with special needs people," Marmer said.

Some of the services include counselling for individuals and families, weekend retreats, vocational training and job placement, Shabbat programs, Birthright Israel trips for people with mobility or special learning needs, and summer camps for members of all ages.

"We have summer camp programs in the Moshava Ba'ir, [a Jewish summer day camp based in Toronto] and for the first time we're doing a program in the Moshava Ennismore sleep-away camp," Marmer said.

Eli Hagler, Yachad's associate director based in New York, said its summer camp program teaches young adults that despite some physical or mental differences, everyone deserves to be included.

"Through our summer programs, more than 5,000 children and teens have had the opportunity to travel throughout North America and Israel. Our programs in association with 10 mainstream summer camps have taught children and teenagers that while someone may appear different from themselves, we are all the same," he said.

As a non-profit that relies on donations to operate its programs, Yachad organizes a number of fundraisers, including marathons that take place annually in Miami, Toronto, New York and Jerusalem. To date more than 1,800 people have run the marathon, and raised more than $2.7 million.

On May 3, Yachad's Toronto chapter will partner with GoodLife Fitness to organize a five-kilometre run to raise funds for the organization. Each runner is required to raise a minimum of $300.

Yachad is running a Purim-themed fundraising drive, offering custom gift baskets that are assembled by Yachad participants.

Marmer said despite Yachad's 30-year history, there are still many in the Jewish community who don't know it exists. "My goal is to educate people in society about [people with] special needs and Yachad," she said.

"If they have a physical disability or a mental disability, whatever it is, our motto is... 'because everyone belongs.' [People with special needs] have a rightful place in society just like everybody else and it is our mission to include them and accept them just like we accept every other person."

Marmer said many people think that working with people with special needs is a big mitzvah. "But the way we look at it, it's not that you're doing a kindness... we're the ones who are learning so much and getting so much out of it. It's not so much that we are giving of our time and doing chesed for somebody else. We are really getting a lot out of it," she said. ■

Survivors interviewed for SS trial

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Max Eisen's memory is a thing to behold: he rattles off names, places and precise dates with ease. Complementing those is a full palette of sensory impressions: smells, sounds, pains, tastes. Even at 86, which he turns next month, Eisen is as sharp a witness as anyone could wish for.

If the look on Thomas Walther's face was any indication, Eisen's horrific memories of Auschwitz will be useful.

A retired German judge turned Nazi hunter and prosecutor, Walther was in Canada last month to interview survivors of the infamous death camp in the case against Oskar Groening. It's hoped the videotaped testimony of at least 23 Canadian "co-plaintiffs," and dozens of others worldwide, will help secure Groening's conviction as probably the last Auschwitz guard to face justice.

Now 93, Groening has been charged with 300,000 counts of aiding and abetting murder.

Known as "the Bookkeeper of Auschwitz," the SS sergeant was in charge of collecting the cash, jewelry and valuables of Hungarian Jews between May 15 and July 12, 1944. In that time, 437,000 Jews from Hungary and neighbouring territories arrived by train at Auschwitz, and 300,000 were sent to the gas chambers right away.

The testimony of co-plaintiffs—those whose loved ones were murdered at the camp—will be used as evidence against Groening, who, though he did not participate directly in killings and worked behind the scenes, is seen as a cog in the Nazi murder machine.

Eisen, a well-known local Holocaust educator and speaker, was born in the Czech town of Moldava nad Bodvou and arrived at Auschwitz in May, 1944 as a 15-year-old along with his parents, two brothers, a sister, three grandparents, aunts and an uncle.

Sitting before Walther and a video camera last week at a Toronto hotel, Eisen calmly recalled his nightmare, with occasional gentle prodding from Walther on specifics – dates, visuals, times of day.

Eisen arrived at the camp in the dead of night after a hellish train trip from the town of Kassa (Kosice). There were blinding floodlights and shouts of "Raus! Schnell!" ("Out! Fast!") There was a horrible stench and he saw "big" flames shooting out from "something."

"We were in total shock. Everyone was numb."

His mother, grandparents, aunts and siblings were shunted to the left for "disinfection," and gassed. Eisen, his father and uncle were directed to the right.

Their hair was shorn and Eisen saw gold crowns yanked out of mouths with pliers. In the shower, he witnessed a new arrival who had dropped his glasses being stomped to death by an SS guard. "I remember hearing his ribs cracking. This was the first killing I saw. I was in total shock. My father said, 'keep your mouth shut.'" The three males were tattooed, given uniforms and sent on back-breaking work details.

One day, Eisen's father asked fellow prisoners when he would see the rest of his family. The reply was: "Your family has gone through the chimney."

A few months later, his father and uncle were "selected" for death. "That's it," Eisen said. "I was an orphan. I was devastated."

Caught "loafing" one day, he was beaten nearly to death. "My head was smashed in. I lost a lot of blood and was thrown into a ditch. I knew my life was over."

Carted back to the camp's hospital, Eisen received surgery, survived and was appointed the operating room's cleaner. He worked 19 hours a day but in relative safety.

In all, he survived five concentration camps. Of his 60 prewar relatives, only three survived the Holocaust.

Groening's trial is set to begin April 21 in the northern German city of Lueneburg.

Eisen said he would like to see the former guard convicted and get a life sentence, but instead of jail, spend the rest of his life doing community work and speaking to students.

"That would be the only productive thing to do," he said. ■

Via Rail plot points to terror threat in Canada, Jewish groups say

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca

Jewish groups are watching with concern the trial of two alleged Islamic extremists in Toronto accused of plotting to derail a Canadian passenger train and who the prosecution says also planned to target Jews.

One of the accused, Raed Jaser, a Palestinian born in Abu Dhabi who has been living in Toronto since 1993, allegedly told an undercover FBI agent in 2012 that his longer term plans were to assassinate Jews or "Zionists," as well as Canadian political leaders, the court heard on the trial's opening day, Feb. 2.

Jaser and Tunisian-born Chiheb Esseghaeir, a former PhD student in Quebec, are charged in the alleged 2012 plot to derail a Via Rail train travelling between Toronto and New York by tampering with a bridge on the Canadian side of the route.

Their demand was that Canada and the United States withdraw their armies from Muslim lands, the court heard.

Crown attorney Croft Michaelson said Esseghaier was receiving orders from his "Mujahedeen brothers" in Iran where he had trained on two occasions in 2011 and 2012.

In September 2012, Jaser and Esseghaeir brought the undercover agent to the Highland Creek rail bridge in Scarborough and revealed plans to cut a hole in it, the court heard.

Michaelson said Jaser abandoned the train derailment idea after he felt police suspected him, but Esseghaier, with whom he then fell out, tried to find another accomplice.

According to Michaelson, Jaser allegedly said it would have more impact "to kill the expensive Jew, the Zionist" with a sniper rifle and spoke of getting a gun license. In conversation with the agent, he is alleged to have talked about how easy it would be to gain access to "powerful and wealthy members" of the Canadian Jewish community.

Jaser and Esseghaier were arrested in April 2013. Both have pleaded not guilty.

Martin Sampson, national communications director for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said the accusations are further evidence that "radical Islam is real and exists in Canada.

"There are those walking among us who would not only attack their fellow citizens, but our democratic principles."

Jaser's alleged intention to kill Jews is "chilling, but not surprising. Islamists are anti-Semitic," he said.

B'nai Brith Canada chief executive officer Michael Mostyn said media reports of at least one of the defendants allegedly interchangeably using the words "'Jew" and "Zionist" when referring to possible targets warrants attention.

Michael Mostyn

"It has long been standard practice by radical Islamists to conflate these two terms when referring to their intended victims in a transparent attempt to mask their hatred toward Jews," he said.

"This phenomenon can be seen on our university campuses and even the grounds of [the] Ontario legislature, and is something B'nai Brith has been actively exposing and condemning.

"We hope that police, government officials and the broader Canadian society better understand this hateful propaganda as more details from the trial emerge."

Sampson said CIJA is in regular communication with public security agencies across Canada, and "we have no information of a specific or credible threat against the Jewish community at this time. We are following the security protocols in place.

"Obviously, as an at-risk community, we must be vigilant."

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, who chairs the Montreal Jewish community's security committee, said, "First of all, we have to applaud the authorities for disrupting this plot, because I shudder to think of the carnage that would have ensued if it came to fruition."

This alleged plot, and the killing of two soldiers in St. Jean-sur-Richelieu and Ottawa last year by people who were apparently motivated by jihadism, is, according to Rabbi Poupko, "a reminder of the compelling need for Canadian intelligence agencies to have adequate resources to protect Canadian lives from Islamic radicalism."

He also reiterated that local Muslim leaders should be alert to any signs of radicalism in their communities.

The jury trial is scheduled to last between six and eight weeks. ■

Volunteer moms build new library at school

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Thanks to a group of dedicated moms, students at the Joe Dwek Ohr HaEmet Sephardic School will benefit from a new library at the Thornhill-based Orthodox Sephardi school.

Rachel Keslassy, who has two children enrolled at Ohr HaEmet, is a volunteer with the school's Mom's Association library committee.

Through the Mom's Association, women raise funds for the school to address the needs of staff and students.

Keslassy said she and a number of other concerned parents decided that a permanent library in the school was essential. She said that until now, students had been able to borrow books from a portable library, a cart filled with books that would go from classroom to classroom.

Now that the school is up to date technologically, having raised money over the years to acquire computers, laptops, Smart boards, iPads and other mobile devices, the volunteers felt it was time to develop a library.

"A lot of the time, children are so engaged in technology-based things, and they may be missing out on what it means to read independently and have an appreciation for something tangible besides an iPad or an iPhone," Keslassy said.

"Having that space is also very important, because it creates a culture within the school where children understand how to behave in quiet space and get excited about reading," Keslassy said.

Maytal Oziel, a library committee volunteer who has a daughter enrolled in the school, said that as an avid reader as a child, it bothered her that students weren't coming home with books to read each week.

"They should be coming home with books at least once a week," said Oziel, who, like Keslassy and Vanessa Benarroch, another volunteer, is a public school teacher.

"At public schools, you visit a library once a week, and you come home with a book. A mobile library can only offer so much. Having a place where the kids can sit on a carpet and have a book read to them, having the ability to come into a space and do research about a topic... being able to be independent and choose a book on their own... being responsible for the book can teach them a lot of things," Oziel said.

"The vision for the library is to be a place where students can lounge, a carpeted area where teachers can sit and read aloud a book to their students... We want bookshelves that are easy to access... we want a teachers' corner with books that are geared for the holidays of that month and are curriculum-based... We want a system so that students can search independently," Keslassy said.

Maytal Oziel, a library committee volunteer, sorts through book donations for the Joe Dwek Ohr HaEmet Sephardic School's new library.

She said the library is currently being developed in the school's computer lab, but the ultimate goal is to expand into a larger space, to build a portable on school grounds.

Of course, fulfilling this vision, which has been in the works since October, requires volunteers, and donations. Keslassy said she's hoping they can raise $50,000, but they will utilize every dollar they manage to raise to its fullest potential.

Benarroch, who also has two children enrolled in the school, said she decided to volunteer on the committee because it bothered her that the school didn't have a library.

"Being a teacher, I know how much my students love to go to the library."

Benarroch added that her children were thrilled when her sister took her kids, aged four and six, to a public library recently.

"You have no idea how excited my son was. He wanted to go back. He was so excited to be able to pick whatever book he liked, whatever book he wanted to read," she said.

"Often times, a teacher says, here, read this book, take this book home. But he wants to choose his own book, even if he doesn't like it."

She added that there is a lot of excitement in the school as the library continues to take shape and book donations continue to come in.

"We're very excited because the school has been in existence for so long... they're celebrating 40 years in May. So we're very excited about this project." ■

Israeli tennis court to be named for Toronto teen

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Ben Wilder and Eric Hildebrand were good friends. They attended the same private school together, played on the same soccer and basketball teams together, and Eric admired Ben's skill at tennis.

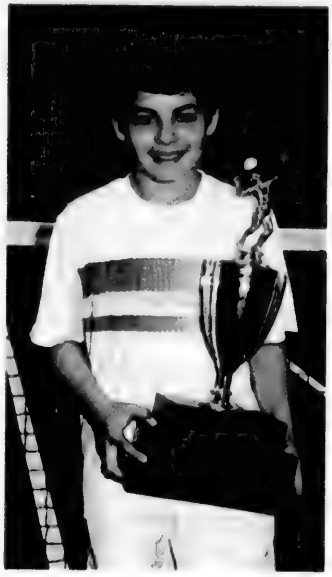
Their bar mitzvahs were scheduled one week apart, but before they could celebrate each other's coming of age, Ben was unexpectedly struck by a fatal illness and died.

To honour his friend and create a lasting legacy, Eric asked guests at his bar mitzvah to make a contribution to the Israel Tennis Centers (ITC) Foundation in Ben's name.

"In lieu of bar mitzvah gifts, please make a donation to the Ben Wilder Fund and honour Ben's life by helping kids in Israel," Eric said in a note to guests.

Nearly $12,000 has been turned over to the ITC Foundation, which has earmarked the funds and other moneys yet to be raised toward the naming of a tennis court in Israel in Wilder's name.

The court will be at the ITC's flagship location in Ramat Hasharon, said Toby Rosner, executive-director of the ITC Foundation in Canada.



Ben Wilder holds the trophy he was awarded after winning an under-18 tennis tournament at York Racquets Club.

Altogether, $100,000 needs to be raised to name the court, and Rosner believes the goal will be reached later this year. Late last month, the ITC added another $10,000, provided by local donors, towards the project.

Ben, who at 12 won an under-18 tournament at York Racquets Club, had just completed Grade 7 at the Sterling Hall School when he died. In a message to parents and students, principal Rick Parsons recalled him as "a warm, kind, active and charismatic young man who will be dearly missed."

Students at the school compiled their own list of things "our friend, Ben Wilder, showed us."

Among the lessons learned were: to look at things from new perspectives; to be self-motivated; to look at the glass as half-full; to make the best of any situation; to make other people feel important; to be yourself; to never give up; to appreciate the value of positive energy, hard work and perseverance; and to get things done to the best of one's ability.

Elyse Hildebrand, Eric's mother, recalled Ben as mature beyond his years, with clear leadership qualities. "He was smart, mature, funny. He was very inclusive, he made everyone feel welcome," she said.

She recalled how much Ben and Eric enjoyed playing on the school basketball team together, and travelling to Vancouver for a tournament.

When the family was planning Eric's bar mitzvah, they wanted to find something connected to Israel to honour Ben. "Eric kept saying, 'I want to do something with tennis,'" she said.

Ben loved tennis, and "he was really good. He had a really wicked serve," Eric said.

Off the court, "Ben was really funny. He was really nice to everyone."

Naming the Israeli tennis court "will help Israel and help the good memory of my friend, Ben," he added.

ITC was established in 1976. It operates 14 tennis centres across Israel, providing instruction and competition to Israelis of all backgrounds, including more than 400,000 children. The ITC is known for providing a structured and nurturing environment, benefiting many youngsters in disadvantaged neighbourhoods. ■

Mayim Bialik calls herself a 'product of federation'

jshupac@thecjn.ca

In nearly every sense, Mayim Bialik is an atypical Hollywood star.

It would be difficult to come away with a different impression of the accomplished actress, writer, scholar and observant Jew after listening to her keynote speech at the Feb. 2 UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's annual campaign 2015 closing event.

Held at downtown event space The Carlu and attended by 800 campaign donors, the evening featured speeches and a dessert reception, all to celebrate the $53.1 million – the product of about 16,000 gifts – raised so far to support UJA projects in the 2015 fiscal year (donations are expected to roll in until the fiscal year begins in July).

Funds from the campaign, which launched in September, will go toward Jewish social service delivery in the GTA, as well as community building, education, strengthening bonds with UJA's partner agencies in Israel and advocacy through the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

The $53.1 million outpaces by several hundred thousand dollars the sum raised by this time last year for Campaign 2014, and it doesn't include the $5.6 million collected for last summer's Israel emergency relief fund, federation officials said.

Bialik, 39, was an appropriate guest, calling herself a steadfast Zionist and a "personal product of [UJA] federation" growing up in California.

Best known for her roles as the young Bette Midler in the film Beaches, the title character on television sitcom Blossom and, currently, as Amy Farrah Fowler on the popular sitcom The Big Bang Theory, Bialik's early influences included attending Jewish camp on a federation subsidy.

"Because of federation, I was able to attend Jewish camp for five weeks a year, to meet other Jews and learn," she told the audience. "It's because of people like you who gave to people like me, whose family didn't have money for camp."

A self-described outsider in the television industry, Bialik spoke eloquently about her upbringing, her family's Jewish history, her career trajectory and the Jewish values that have "kept [her] sane in Hollywood."

After her speech, she was interviewed by Erica Ehm, a former MuchMusic VJ and publisher of the lifestyle publication YummyMummyClub.ca.

Bialik's talk was preceded by a roster of speakers, including Morris Perlis, chair of the board of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto; DJ Schneeweiss, consul general of Israel in Toronto; Alison Himel, chair of UJA's women's philanthropy; and Campaign 2015 chairs, Andrea Cohen and David Matlow.

"Together, we've changed thousands of lives," said Cohen. "We are one people – a people with a big heart, and when united, we're invincible."

Bialik described herself as a bookish and unpopular teen– albeit one with her own hit TV show – who attended public school but felt safest at Jewish summer camp.

She said she loves performing, but hates award shows and observes tzniut. She also has a PhD in neuroscience, is a mother of two, a lactation counsellor and a contributor to the Jewish parenting site Kveller.com.

Born in California into what she referred to as a fairly unobservant family, Bialik said she loved her weekly Hebrew school classes and felt extremely close to her Yiddish-speaking grandparents.

She got her first professional acting gig at age 10 and soon after landed her role in Blossom. Bialik took a hiatus from acting to attend UCLA, at which point she became more observant and got involved with groups like Hillel.

After getting her doctorate in neuroscience and having two children, she returned to acting, joining the cast of The Big Bang Theory. In 2012, she wrote a book on attachment parenting called Beyond the Sling.

Nowadays, she often speaks at Jewish federation events, but noted that this was her first Canadian appearance.

"I'm a liberal person," she said. "I want to change the perception that if you support Israel you're not liberal… I don't always agree with Israeli policies, but I stand with the State of Israel."

Bialik closed the talk by laying out seven Jewish principles she credits for keeping her grounded: family values, a sense of routine, emphasis on joy, the notion of generosity, the notion of otherness, God and Israel.

These things take her out of herself, she explained, instilling in her a sense of responsibility to her family, her community and global Judaism. ■

Lessons for defeating BDS on campus

Judy Zelikovitz

On Jan. 29, the Trent University Central Student Association passed a motion revoking a 2013 policy endorsing boycotts, divestment and sanctions (BDS) against the State of Israel. This development – a setback for the divisive and destructive BDS movement – would never have happened were it not for a group of dedicated Trent students. Their remarkable victory is significant in that it offers a four-point blueprint for how campus activists can effectively counter BDS.

First, it's critical that anti-BDS students build a highly motivated coalition of allies to take unified action. The Trent example shows that victories against BDS can be achieved even on campuses with few Jewish students, provided the Jewish community engages and supports our non-Jewish friends who are in a position to make a difference.

At Trent, both Jewish and non-Jewish students organized the successful campaign against the BDS policy and proactively reached out to and worked with the various political clubs on campus. This approach demonstrates that BDS is not just a Jewish or Israel issue, but a Canadian issue concerning student rights and campus discrimination. The same principle was true at the University of Regina, home of the first student union in Canada to pass a BDS resolution in 2012. A year later, a non-Jewish union member who had attended a Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA)-organized student leader mission to Israel successfully passed a motion annulling BDS.

Second, successful political campaigns at all levels expend tremendous energy knocking on doors, identifying supporters, and contacting them in the days and hours leading up to the close of polls. An intensive get-out-the-vote effort is no less critical in student votes.

Overturning a student union policy at Trent required securing a two-thirds majority of votes at the student union's annual general meeting. This was no easy task, and it certainly could not have been achieved without a strong push for supporters to attend the meeting and vote. There is value in having brilliant messages, online ads, eye-catching posters, and persuasive flyers. Arguably, however, nothing makes a greater difference than in-person outreach and repeated reminders to supporters about why, how, when and where to vote.

Third, it's critical that students work with supportive faculty members. While students will only spend a few years on campus, faculty have a wealth of experience. They can offer invaluable advice to students on how to work with the administration, frame their messages, engage other student groups, and navigate campus policies. At Trent, the anti-BDS campaign enjoyed strong support from a number of faculty members, including Prof. Asaf Zohar, who chairs a CIJA-affiliated group called Canadian Academics for Peace in the Middle East (CAP). As Zohar noted: "The events at Trent speak to the power of a determined group of students who were successful in mobilizing and engaging their colleagues to make a difference."

Many Canadians are unaware that student union votes on BDS have no tangible effect on a university's policies or investments. Faculty have significant credibility with university officials and can serve as a vital bridge between students and administrators to help ensure the latter disavows BDS when resolutions are passed. When administrations publicly criticize BDS and applaud academic partnerships with Israelis, it signals to Canadians that BDS is a fringe movement that warrants rejection.

Fourth, we cannot overlook the value of students working with the broader Jewish community. At Trent, members of the Jewish and pro-Israel community in Peterborough provided advice and support, assuring students they were not alone and enjoyed backing from residents with strong local roots.

Students also received resources and materials from CIJA, which provides advocacy training, programs, and support for Hillels and students across Canada. As Rebecca Hubble, a student and key organizer in the Trent campaign, remarked: "After the first email that I sent to CIJA, I immediately received full support and guidance for how to approach and plan the anti-BDS campaign…a great deal of advice on how to strategically plan the campaign, reach out to students and get the message across effectively… Everything that CIJA provided for me and my team helped us immensely."

It is important to reaffirm that BDS generally garners only a weak level of support among students, and it often takes fewer votes than one would think to thwart anti-Israel resolutions. Pro-Israel students at Trent have shown that BDS can be defeated with hard work and the right strategy. By doing so, they have provided a case study in effective advocacy that can prove instructive for similar efforts by Hillels and student activists across Canada. ■

A Shoah survivor who found kindness in unexpected places

Mira Sucharov

As the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz approached last month, discussion turned to the shrinking number of survivors. My father-in-law, Bill Gluck of Vancouver, was one of them, having been deported to Auschwitz from Hungary in 1944, a beautiful boy of 13 with piercing green eyes, a compact frame and a knockout grin. We mentally celebrated his life on that anniversary. But not 24 hours later, his ailing body gave out.

As we began to grieve my father-in-law's death, I became aware of the delicate dance between remembering Holocaust survivors for the individuals they were and invoking their identity as survivors.

Esteemed psychoanalyst and child survivor of the Holocaust Anna Ornstein specializes in trauma. Yet she bristles at being called a "survivor," she told the Washington Post on Jan. 23.

"That's almost like another crime," she said, adding, "We were reduced to a race… This is my name. I had parents who raised me a certain way, and that was not washed away."

Mourners don't have the luxury of asking the departed how they wish to be remembered. And in any case, we each carry our own points of salience with us when we remember.

At my father-in-law's funeral and shivah, Bill's nephew recalled dancing on his uncle's feet. My husband recalled the invisible love that had been all around him, like clean air. Bill's daughter reflected on the heartiness of autumn's last remaining leaves as she helped make her father comfortable during his final weeks. And then there were his fellow Holocaust survivors, coming to pay respects to a departed member of their own.

Before I met him some 20 years ago, my father-in-law had visited Vancouver schools, telling students his personal story of survival and freedom. For some of the audience, this was their first experience of learning about the Holocaust. One of these students later befriended a young man from Toronto when they studied together at Queen's University. That young Torontonian would, a few years later, become Bill's son-in-law.

My stepmother encountered Bill years before I met him, hearing him relay his personal account one evening at the Vancouver Jewish Community Centre. I, too, recall reading about Bill's journey in the pages of the Jewish Western Bulletin before meeting his son, whom I would go on to marry.

Survivors manage to touch so many people, both directly and indirectly. Yet, as each one is, my father-in-law was so much more than the sum of his harrowing experiences. Along with his wife, my beloved mother-in-law, Bill built a life of love out of the depths of inhumanity. He lavished a great deal of affection and nurturing on his family, and found his own moments of serenity and solitude as he took up distance sailing around the islands of British Columbia in his later years.

As the rabbi spoke about my father-in-law at the graveside service, he spoke of the godliness that surely ran through him. In young Bill's harrowing months at Auschwitz, he found ways to help his fellow inmates.

Perhaps most profoundly, Bill had also committed to memory details of instances of kindness amid the horror. Sometimes a certain German guard in the camps would help him – pulling him out of a work line to give him a less strenuous task, placing him on a bicycle during a long march, or even giving him his gun to hold. These stories of goodness didn't die with Bill, for my father-in-law had taken pains to impress these anecdotes upon his children.

So perhaps the godliness of survival is also the godliness of looking for kindness wherever it happens to be, and instilling goodness in the everyday. Bill wanted life to be simple and good. He wanted to find kindness around him, and he hoped others did, too. ■

Biden, other Democrats will not attend Netanyahu's address

RON KAMPEAS, JTA
WASHINGTON

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, right, with U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden in January 2014. Biden has said he would be out of the country when Netanyahu is to speak to the U.S. Congress. FLASH 90 PHOTO

In a blow to Israel's efforts to contain the controversy over Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's upcoming speech to Congress, U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden announced he would not attend Netanyahu's upcoming address.

Biden's office told media last Friday that he would be out of the country and would not fill his role as the president of the Senate during the joint meeting of Congress on March 3. The announcement came as leading black and Hispanic Democrats indicated they too would not attend. A Jewish lawmaker, Steve Cohen, told JTA blacks in his district were asking him not to go because they saw the speech as disrespecting U.S. President Barack Obama.

Meanwhile, Abraham Foxman, the national director of the Anti-Defamation League, publicly urged Netanyahu in an interview with the Forward last week not to follow through with his plans to address Congress, saying the fracas had devolved into a "circus." Rabbi Rick Jacobs, the president of the Union for Reform Judaism, made the same call in an interview with the paper.

Administration officials had already said that the president and other senior officials would not meet with Netanyahu, ostensibly because the speech would be just two weeks before the Israeli election.

Congressional Democrats say the speech is unacceptable because John Boehner, the House of Representatives speaker, invited Netanyahu to rebut Obama's continued backing of nuclear talks between the major powers and Iran. Netanyahu, like most Republicans, believes the talks are headed for a bad deal that will leave Iran on the threshold of a nuclear weapon.

Netanyahu has phoned senior Democrats, and Israeli Ambassador to the United States Ron Dermer has met with many of the rank and file in an effort to smooth over their differences. Netanyahu and Dermer have said the speech will emphasize bipartisan support for Israel and will praise Obama for his backing of the country at critical times. They also say Netanyahu is determined to keep the date because he feels he needs to urgently convey his warning about a nuclear Iran ahead of a March 24 deadline on achieving the outline of a deal.

Democrats, however, have grown more adamant in opposing the speech, with a growing number of prominent minority Democrats saying they will stay away. Party leaders in both chambers say they will attend but are warning that the speech might backfire.

Jewish lawmakers have met with Dermer and expressed their displeasure with the timing of the speech. Cohen, who is circulating a letter among colleagues urging Boehner to postpone the speech until after Israeli elections and congressional votes on an Iran sanctions bill, told Dermer last week that black leaders in his Memphis district were asking him not to attend.

"It's become less and less attractive" to attend, Cohen told JTA after the meeting. "My district is majority African American and a lot of people see this as dismissive of the first African American president."

Cohen said Dermer told him Netanyahu is determined to go ahead with the speech.

The Israeli deputy foreign minister, Tzachi Hanegbi, suggested that Boehner misled the Israelis about the invitation, which Boehner said was made in the name of both parties. Within hours of Boehner announcing the invitation on Jan. 21, Democrat Nancy Pelosi, the House minority leader, and the White House said they had been kept out of the loop.

"It appears that the speaker of Congress made a move, in which we trusted, but which it ultimately became clear was a one-sided move and not a move by both sides," Reuters quoted Hanegbi as saying on an Israeli radio station.

A slate of 48 Republican House members signed a letter countering the one circulated by Cohen asking for a speech delay. The letter thanked Boehner for organizing the speech, saying "it is necessary now for Congress to hear from Prime Minister Netanyahu, and welcome his expertise on Iran's regional designs."

Matt Brooks, the director of the Republican Jewish Coalition, suggested on Twitter that his party would use the issue against Democrats in elections.

"Dems have a choice- stand w/PM Netanyahu and the Jewish com against Iran or w/Pres Obama," he said. The RJC "will make sure people know what they choose."■

Bibi sounds warning on Iran

JTA
JERUSALEM

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel "will take any action" to prevent the world powers from signing a "bad and dangerous" deal with Iran over its nuclear program.

Netanyahu made the remarks Feb.8 at the start of the regular weekly cabinet meeting after Iran's foreign minister said his country and world powers intend to complete a framework agreement by the end of March.

"From this stems the urgency of our efforts to try and block this bad and dangerous agreement," Netanyahu told the cabinet. "The major powers and Iran are galloping toward an agreement that will enable Iran to arm itself with nuclear weapons, which will endanger the existence of the State of Israel."

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry and Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammed Javad Zarif met last weekend on the sidelines of the Munich Security Conference.

Zarif called for the lifting of sanctions on Iran, calling them a "liability" and saying that, "You need to get rid of them if you want a solution." He said he did not believe an extension of the nuclear talks past the June 30 deadline would be "either necessary or useful."

"I don't think if we don't have an agreement it will be the end of the world," Zarif added.

The two sides set a March deadline for a framework agreement last November.

Zarif criticized Netanyahu, saying that Israel is hiding behind an existential Iranian threat.

"They cannot create a smokescreen to hide their atrocities against the Palestinian people, their continued violation of Palestinian human rights, their continued acts of aggression against Palestinian, Lebanese, Jordanian and Syrian people under the guise of a hypothetical Iranian threat that is more hype than anything else," Zarif said during a speech at the conference.

"Iran is not threatening anybody. We are not threatening to use force, we are not saying that all options are on the table."■

Shiite cleric reaches out to Jews

ELHANAN MILLER
JERUSALEM

Israelis usually associate Shiite clerics in Lebanon with the terror group Hezbollah, a powerful religious organization committed to the destruction of the Jewish state. But a Beirut-based cleric is surprising the public by spreading messages of peace and non-violence in Hebrew on social media.

"We call on rabbis, priests and Muslim clerics – both Sunni and Shia – to underplay religious traditions and texts that call for violence, since they are more dangerous than nuclear weapons," wrote Sayyed Muhammad Ali Husseini, secretary general of the Shiite group the Arabic Islamic Council, in Hebrew on his Facebook page last Sunday.

Just days after Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah warned of a possible war with Israel following an attack by his organization that left two Israeli soldiers dead on the border with Lebanon, Husseini said that religious texts must be historically contextualized rather than used to incite perpetual violence.

"Various religious texts calling for the use of violence and ruthlessness to achieve goals are extremely dangerous when used by groups we have warned against in the past," he continued. "These texts religiously sanction acts of violence and murder. Obviously, these are texts that were implemented in specific, limited situations; they cannot necessarily be applied to our time, since every situation has its own unique circumstances."

Sayyed Muhammad Ali Husseini FACEBOOK

This was not the first time that Husseini directly addressed an Israeli audience. On Jan. 19, he posted a video on Facebook directed at "our cousins, the children of Isaac son of Abraham."

"We believe that not all Jews are bad [just as] not all Muslims are terrorists. Let us cousins put our conflicts aside and stay away from evil and hatred. Let us unite in peace and love," he said in broken Hebrew.

Following the burning alive of Jordanian pilot Muaz Kasasbeh last week by the Islamic State in Syria, Husseini wrote on Facebook, "We heard and saw yesterday how our brother in humanity was burned. Has the Holocaust returned once again?"

Breaking from the traditional Shiite loyalty to the Iranian leadership, Husseini has also spoken out publicly against what he dubbed the complete Iranian domination of Lebanon.

"It is not new for the Iranian regime to explicitly proclaim its security, economic, political and even religious control of Lebanon," he told Emirates TV channel Al-Aan in May 2014. "We have warned of this and condemned it, and shall never accept it."

Eddy Cohen, a lecturer at Bar-Ilan University's Communications Department who has helped Husseini translate his messages into Hebrew, told Israel's Army Radio last Sunday that he did not know how representative Husseini's ideas are in Lebanon, but noted that the Shiite cleric seemed unconcerned about spreading his posts in Hebrew and boasted some 1,800 followers on Facebook.

"He is a moderate, and most Lebanese are sick of war and hostilities," Cohen said. ■

Arab minority invisible to Israeli Jews, Rivlin says

ELHANAN MILLER
JERUSALEM

Israel's President Reuven Rivlin criticized Israeli-Jewish ignorance of Arab society at a conference hosted at his residence last Sunday, warning that both groups are "blind to each other."

"How many of us Jews know colleagues at work who are Arab? How many of us have true friends who are Arab? How many of us know the agenda of the Arab public, or the differences dividing their society?" Rivlin wondered at an event dedicated to the integration of Arab citizens in the private sector, addressing a crowd of business leaders and civil society representatives.

"A huge gap has grown over the years between two societies that live next to each other and with each other, and yet are blind to each other," he said. "We must admit the painful truth: namely, that for the majority of Jewish-Israeli society the Arab public occupies a blind spot."

Israel's role as nation-state of Jewish People needs repair

Reuben Berman

Since the birth of Israel, the Diaspora community has been counted as a strategic asset to the Jewish state. The political and financial resources of the Jews outside of Israel, especially in North America, have consistently been harnessed to protect the security of Israel and help the Jewish state flourish. In moments of crisis, Jews stood shoulder to shoulder in support of Israel, a nation that was viewed as a unifying force between Jews, regardless of location or denomination.

Unfortunately, this paradigm is shifting, and the relationship between the Jewish world and Israel is in danger of disintegrating. Because of factors within the Israeli government, Israeli society, and the Jewish world, Israel's role as the nation-state of the Jewish People, and the unified partnership that this instils between Jews around the world and Israel, is in dire need of reconsideration and repair.

In Israel, institutions – both governmental and religious – rarely take into account the beliefs and positions of Diaspora Jewry when making decisions. For example, whereas more than 70 per cent of Jews outside of Israel align themselves with movements other than Orthodoxy, in Israel there is an Orthodox monopoly on the state's regulation of religious practice. This dissonance causes tensions on issues such as recognition of conversions done by Conservative or Reform rabbis.

In addition, Israel's sustained control over Palestinian populations occurs in the context of increasingly frequent and violent rounds of conflict alongside continuous erosion of the viability of a negotiated two-state solution. This reality escalates tension with the liberal political and social affiliations of the majority of Diaspora Jewry.

The Israeli public, and especially young people, also lack a strong connection to their cousins in the Diaspora. Until 2008, there were no chapters in Israeli history textbooks that covered the shape of modern Jewry beyond the borders of Israel. Generations of Israelis have gained only a vague unidirectional understanding of the partnership, in which world Jewry supports Israel politically and financially. General opinion states that since members of world Jewry don't serve in the army or pay taxes, their criticisms and concerns are illegitimate.

At the same time, the traditional Jewish establishment that has acted as the centralized mediator of the Israel-Jewish world relationship is weakening. In North America, for example, synagogues are struggling, core institutions of the community are having a difficult time making ends meet, and, most importantly, there has been a steady rate of decline in the commitment of young Jews to Jewish life and Jewish institutions.

The major Jewish world institutions are having an extremely difficult time proving their relevance to a generation for whom their Jewishness and Israel is increasingly unimportant. The generation currently coming of age is increasingly disengaged with its cultural identity as Jewish, and, by extension, to the Jewish state. The 2013 Pew study of American Jewry showed that one out of three millennials (born after 1980) are Jews of no religion. People in this category are far less likely to see Israel as important to their Jewish identity.

When combined, these issues point toward clear generational and geographical fractures that have already begun to threaten the basis of the partnership that has connected Jews the world over to the Jewish state. The unity that it fostered is in many respects giving way to a bitter divide.

If Israel loses its place as the nation-state of the Jewish People, it loses its raison d'etre. If world Jewry loses its connection to the Jewish state, they will forsake the greatest unifying factor among Jews since the creation of the Bible. The time has come for the entire Jewish community, the world over, to have a frank discussion of the role Israel plays as the nation-state of the Jewish People. ■

Prosecutor considered asking for Kirchner's arrest

JTA
BUENOS AIRES

Alberto Nisman

Argentine special prosecutor Alberto Nisman considered asking for the arrest of the country's president, according to a draft warrant found at his apartment.

In the legal complaint found by police in a trash can at Nisman's Buenos Aires apartment following his unexplained death last month, Nisman called for the arrest of Argentina's President Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner and Foreign Minister Hector Timerman, who is Jewish.

Had the warrants been issued, "it would have provoked a crisis without precedent in Argentina," a political analyst, Sergio Berensztein, said in the New York Times.

Nisman seems to have ultimately decided to denounce Kirchner and her government but not seek her immediate arrest.

Nisman, 51, who was heading the probe into the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish centre, was found shot dead in his apartment on Jan. 18, hours before he was to present evidence to Argentine lawmakers that Kirchner and other government officials covered up Iran's role in the attack, which killed 85 and injured hundreds.

Clarin, the largest newspaper in Argentina, reported the discovery of the draft warrant on Feb.1. The document, which asked for stronger measures against the president than the one that was to be presented finally by Nisman, is dated June 2014.

Anibal Fernandez, secretary general of the presidency, said last week that "somebody" prepared the warrant for Nisman in the last hours before he was to present it and that the prosecutor just signed it.

Viviana Fein, the prosecutor investigating Nisman's death, confirmed last week that Nisman had prepared the draft warrant, whose existence she had initially denied, according to the New York Times.

A federal judge in Argentina who has authored a book about the Holocaust was tapped to pick up Nisman's case against Kirchner.

Daniel Rafecas, who is invited often to speak about the Holocaust, was chosen by lottery Feb. 4. He is well known for applying Argentina's anti-discrimination law in a case centring on skinheads, ordering them to visit the Holocaust Museum in Buenos Aires as part of their probation. ■

Arabs only make up five per cent of employees in business sector

Since taking office in July 2014, Rivlin has dedicated much of his time to bridging the gap between Jews and Arabs in Israel. Last October, he became the first Israeli leader to acknowledge the "terrible crime" of the Kfar Kassem massacre in 1956 in which Israeli border police killed 48 Arab civilians. And last week at a meeting with Arab municipal leaders, Rivlin endorsed the construction of a new Arab city.

"The Arab public in Israel long ago stopped being a minority," he told the gathering. "The task of building bridges and forging a sense of partnership between Jews and Arabs is for me a human, Jewish and Zionist task of the first order."

Research presented on Sunday by Shaldor, an Israeli strategic consulting firm hired by a group of young Arab entrepreneurs, showed that while Arabs comprise 20 per cent of Israeli society, they make up just five per cent of the employees in Israel's business sector. According to Shaldor's data, presented by company vice-president Yakir Lazarov, some 70,000 Arabs were identified as either over-qualified or underemployed (working part-time), a number expected to grow to 126,000 by 2020.

The study found that just seven of Israel's top 47 companies employed Arabs at levels equal to their 20 per cent representation in Israeli society, but none of the companies employed Arabs in mid-level managerial positions or higher.

"The good news is that many of the companies have identified a 'business case' in employing more Arabs, especially in the retail sector," Lazarov said, identifying the main obstacle to Arab integration as the lack of employer access to potential employees. ■

Rabbi leads middle-aged first-timers to Israel

sshefa@thecjn.ca

A person can learn all there is to know about Israeli history, culture and politics through books and videos, but there is nothing that can replace the experience of travelling to the Holy Land, said Rabbi Gary Zweig, who is organizing a tour to Israel for middle-aged first timers.

"I feel like, people are so tied into their iPhones and YouTube videos, they feel like they don't have to go. You have to go, you have to see the place, not just look at it through a Facebook page. It's not the same," Rabbi Zweig said.

At the end of this year, Rabbi Zweig and a Canadian-born Israeli tour guide who has been living in Efrat for the past 20 years, Zvi Bessin, will lead a group of Jews in their 40s and beyond on a 10-day tour of Israel.

"I have at least a dozen people here who I've spoken to in the last six months who haven't been. It's a pity… By this age, around 50, people put going to Israel on their bucket list of things to do," he said, adding that he's been running similar tours since 2004.

He said he wanted to offer an opportunity for the "older than 40" crowd, who have never been on a organized trip to Israel, and are too old to make the cut for other tours like Birthright Israel.

"A lot of people go on their own and it's not the same as going with a group. You miss so much without having a tour guide, you miss so much explanation. I go every two years and I get so much more explanation hearing about the places and the history and it's well worth it to get a tour guide."

Unlike Birthright Israel, the trip is not free. Participants are required to book their own airfare and pay a group rate for accommodations and the guided tours.

Included in the itinerary is a four-day stay in Jerusalem, the exploration of the ruins of Caesarea, a trip to Akko to learn about the famous Akko prison break, a visit to the Zippori National Park, and a tour of the city of Safed visiting old shuls and its artists' colony.

Rabbi Zweig said that he's been working on putting this particular trip together since December 2013.

"Because of the wars, like the [Israel-Gaza War in 2014], some people cancel their trips and then they don't rebook it. A lot of times that happens," he said.

"The first time I went with another tour, there were maybe 100 people booked. This was before the terrorist attacks in 2001 and then 20 people ended up going. It was pretty sad," he recalled.

"When I was doing these trips in 2004, 2005, 2006, there wasn't as much hesitation as other trips. This year, it's more than others," he said, adding that he hopes to bring about 15 people together for this tour.

Although the trip is catered to people who have never been, it's not limited to them.

"I realize there may be a scenario where the husband has been, but the wife hasn't been, or one brother has been and the other brother hasn't been. I'm not limiting anything like that."

Rabbi Zweig said he wants people to experience Israel as it should be experienced.

"People come back and say they had a great time – no it's a life-changing time, especially for first-timers." ■

Images from Lodz Ghetto each tell a story

Henryk Ross photos courtesy Art Gallery of Ontario

TOBY SALTZMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The images captured by the little Leica camera that Henryk Ross ported around the Lodz Ghetto from 1940 to 1944 may be black and white, but the stories they tell are vivid, beyond the iconic views of the Holocaust.

How these images came to light is stunning. When the Germans overtook Lodz – the largest industrial city in Poland – they renamed it Litzmannstadt – and divided it into two sections, cramming some 204,000 Jews into the 2.4-sq.km Lodz Ghetto.

Ross worked as an official photographer for the Statistics Department of the Judenrat (Jewish Council), under the auspices of Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski – the Ghetto Elder who exploited Jews for labour with the motto "Unser Weg is Arbeit!" ("Our way is work!") – to satisfy the Nazi administrator of the ghetto, Hans Biebow.

Ross was mandated to take identification photos, official portraits and propaganda photographs showing Jews being industrially productive.

Judging by his personal photos with his beautiful wife and photographic muse Stefania, and images of gatherings with elegantly dressed guests, Ross arguably enjoyed privileged status as long as he satiated the Nazi penchant for shots of textile workers, mattress makers, shoe cobblers and women embroidering pieces of velvet.

When Ross grasped the menacing annihilation of his fellow Jews, his conscience shone through and he became obsessed with the forbidden act of documenting the realities of ghetto life.

Shooting images on the sly, Ross exposed his Leica lens between folds in his coat and peered through cracks in doors, risking being caught by the Gestapo. When the final liquidation of the ghetto started, Ross remained behind, delegated to search buildings for caches of valuables for Biebow.

THE VEILED SUN, HOLOCAUST MEMOIR, NEWLY TRANSLATED INTO ENGLISH

Toronto translator Vivian Felsen has produced an English version of Paul Schaffer's French Holocaust memoir The Veiled Sun (Le Soleil Voilé), which has recently been published by Vehicule Press of Montreal.

Schaffer spent his teenage years on the run from the Nazis in Austria, Belgium and France, and then in Auschwitz from 1942 to 1945. He survived to become a successful industrialist. His story provides insights into a middle-class Jewish childhood in prewar Vienna, attitudes to Jewish refugees in Vichy France, arrest and detention in France, survival in Auschwitz, and the return to postwar France to face the challenges of re-integration into French society.

First published in France in 2001 and republished in 2009, Schaffer's memoir was written in a highly literate style, which made the experience of translating it all the more rewarding for Felsen, who has previously translated several Yiddish memoirs for the Azrieli Foundation.

"This book is a little different in terms of the quality of the writing and particularly the author's reflections on the Holocaust, including his three years in Auschwitz," she said. The Veiled Sun: From Auschwitz to New Beginnings features a foreword by Serge Klarsfeld and introduction by Simone Veil. www.vehiculepress.com

Play looks at the impact of blacklisting in the 1950s

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When playwright Jeffrey Sweet's friend Kate Draper was working in her first Broadway show, Tommy Tune's A Day in Hollywood, a Night in the Ukraine, in the early 1980s he asked her a theoretical question.

What would her father say if it was in fact directed not by Tune but by Jerome Robbins, who had named people to the House Committee on Un-American Activities in the 1950s.

Her father, dancer Paul Draper, was implicated in that list.

Draper told him that while he would disapprove, he wouldn't likely say anything. "And I thought that if the father would say something, that would make a play," Sweet says.

And out of that idea, The Value of Names, running at the Toronto Centre for the Arts from Feb. 19, was born.

"It is about an actor who is blacklisted," Sweet says. "He made something of a comeback in a sitcom, but he's now in retirement and lives in California. His daughter who he doesn't see very much because she lives in New York, is a young actress. She comes to stay with him because she's been cast in a show in Los Angeles. In the middle of the rehearsals for the play, the director takes sick. So, they bring in a new director and he's the guy who named her father to the House of Un-American Activities Committee."

This puts her in a difficult situation because her father has never forgiven this man who used to be his best friend. Does she stay with the show or does she leave?

"She makes noises that she might leave and the director hears of this and comes up to the house, ostensibly to persuade her to stay with the play, but really because he's looking for an excuse to meet her father. Not to get him to forgive but to get past it so that they can be friends again."

A big conversation ensues between these two former friends. Both wishing there were terms that they could reach each other and at the same time trying to win the other over to their view, so that they can build some kind of a bridge.

Actor relishes role of 8-year-old boy

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Caity Quinn may be 28, but she's starring as eight-year-old Joseph in Pleiades Theatre's production of The Sound of Cracking Bones.

"It's a very, very powerful play," says director John Van Burek. The show, which starts Feb. 14 at Toronto's Theatre Passe Muraille, follows Joseph and 13-year-old Elikia after they escape from a group of rebel forces who are using them as child soldiers.

Canadian playwright Suzanne Lebeau penned her 2009 Governor General Award-winning play in French and Van Burek translated it to English with Julia Duchesne. The cast will perform it in its original language in the final week of their run.

Though Quinn may seem like an unusual choice to play Joseph, Van Burek describes her as "an incredible find." Since he couldn't use child actors due to the show's "harrowing" content, he needed to find adults who could convincingly play these roles.

Quinn relishes the complexity of her character and must strike a balance between Joseph's innocence and his slow realization of the world's cruelties – all while believably portraying an eight-year-old boy. "As an actress," she says, "I can sink my teeth into that challenge both emotionally and physically."

Caity Quinn

Though she was immersed in the arts since early childhood, Quinn ventured to the United Kingdom to audition for post-secondary theatre schools. She attended a Tom Stoppard play in London's West End one night and happened to sit beside a film director. "I started talking with him and I told him, 'I've been auditioning here, but I'm not sure if I want to go here, I don't know what I want to do,'" she remembers saying.

The director gave her Jack Garfein's contact information. Garfein – an Auschwitz survivor – has been associated with the likes of Lee Strasberg, James Dean and Marilyn Monroe. Quinn heard that he didn't usually teach young actors, but he accepted her as a student at the tender age of 17. Luckily, she had enough credits to graduate early and spent her last semester of high school learning from Garfein in Paris.

Her career also brought her to New York City where she attended the American Music and Dramatic Academy (AMDA). She earned an undergraduate degree in French language and literature from Hunter College and also studied French while in Paris.

At 19, Quinn was a principal dancer in Disney's Enchanted. In the same year, she appeared in the off-Broadway show The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie, which starred Cynthia Nixon in the title role. "It just was a fabulous experience being able to go to theatre every day to work for a long extended period of time," she recalls.

Originally from Lee, N.H., Quinn moved to Canada and received her MFA in acting from York University in 2013.

Following graduation, she participated in the Paprika Festival – a Toronto-based, theatre training program for emerging artists. There, she worked on her original play titled Ties of Blood: The Brontes, about the ill-fated literary family. The show, which she also brought to the ARTS Project in London, Ont., combines elements of folk music and Japanese kabuki theatre.

First time one of Sweet's plays is being performed here

The Value of Names was first produced as a one-act play at the Actors Theatre of Louisville in 1982, and soon became Sweet's most produced play to date. It so resonated with actor Jack Klugman, he took to the stage in it at six different theatres.

Sweet says that frequently when you find yourself working on something, you become a magnet for exactly the information you need.

"I was starting to work on the play, but I was having trouble writing this from the perspective of the director because I disagreed with him."

Sweet happened to attend an event that featured Elia Kazan, the writer and actor who testified at the committee hearings in 1952 for which he received strong, negative criticism.

"Someone in the audience brought up blacklisting and was taking a shot at Kazan, who gave over names. In that moment, I thought wherever he goes, whoever he meets, Kazan knows this is what people think of him, an SOB who informed on his friends. And that gave me the ability to write from the inside of that character."

Ironically, he wrote the play two years before Kazan's autobiography came out and there are actual lines in it almost word for word, that Sweet had written in his play.

Sweet, whose mother is Jewish, says he grew up loving and identifying with satiric comedy which largely is a product of Jewish comedic voices from the '50s like Mel Brooks, Lenny Bruce and Joan Rivers. He addresses this in his one-man show You Only Shoot the Ones You Love about Jews fleeing Cossacks.

This is the first time one of Sweet's plays is being performed in Canada. A big fan of the Toronto and Stratford theatre scenes, he is thrilled that he has finally gotten his foot in the door here. ■

Gather around the table for a great meal

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When Netivot HaTorah Day School recently launched Gathered Around the Table, its new kosher cookbook, the project organizers had a winning marketing plan.

They created buzz by inviting the whole community to the Warehouse for a party with recipe tastings and food demonstrations. Some 450 people attended and 700 cookbooks were sold.

Guests noshed – or feasted (depending on how hungry they were) on finger foods and bite-sized desserts, all prepared from the recipes from Gathered Around the Table.

Chef Mitchell Lipperman of Exquisite Gourmet, a sponsor of the book, gave recipe demonstrations.

It was an evening with panache and style orchestrated by event planner, Amy Stopnicki. She also happens to be the co-editor of the book.

Stopnicki said Gatherings, the first cookbook put out by Netivot in 2003, had been a big success and so parents were eager to do a followup book. She said she was asked to pilot the project back in 2011.

She stressed, though, that there was a team of people who worked hard to make the cookbook a success, among them, her co-chair Shana Dale Aronson, and Ya'ara Saks, who did business development.

A call was sent out to the school community for recipe submissions and a committee of 55 people volunteered to test them, Stopnicki said, explaining that it took two years to complete the testing and tweaking of the 200 recipes in the book. "It was like having a full-time job for three years."

Gathered Around the Table can be purchased on Amazon, at Netivot HaTorah and Jewish bookstores across the Greater Toronto Area.

Rice Paper Spring Rolls With Dipping Sauce

- ❑ 1-2 tbsp. oil
- ❑ 2 carrots, julienned
- ❑ 2 celery stalks, julienned
- ❑ 1 red bell pepper, julienned
- ❑ 1 onion, julienned
- ❑ 1 zucchini, julienned
- ❑ 2 garlic cloves, chopped
- ❑ 1 tbsp. soy sauce
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste
- ❑ 12 rice paper sheets

Dipping Sauce

- ❑ 2 tbsp. honey
- ❑ juice of 1 lime
- ❑ ¼ cup soy sauce
- ❑ 2 tbsp. rice wine vinegar
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste
- ❑ 1 tsp cayenne pepper (optional)

Heat a large saucepan with oil over a medium-high temperature. Sauté vegetables.

Add garlic, soy sauce, salt and pepper and mix well. Let cool.

Place 1 sheet of rice paper in warm water for approximately 15 seconds, until paper softens and becomes translucent. Remove from water and place on a flat surface. Place a heaping tablespoon of sautéed vegetables in the centre of the rice paper. Fold in the sides and roll up the rice paper like a jelly roll. Then fold in both sides resembling an envelope. Repeat with remaining rolls.

Mix dipping sauce ingredients together and serve alongside rolls. Makes 12 rolls

Parsnip Pear Soup

- ❑ 5 to 6 large parsnips, peeled and cut into small chunks
- ❑ 4 tbsp. olive oil, divided
- ❑ 2 tbsp. pure maple syrup
- ❑ 6 pears, peeled and diced
- ❑ 3 onions, diced
- ❑ 10 cups chicken broth
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 400. Place parsnips on a large roasting pan in a single layer and drizzle with 2 tbsp. olive oil and maple syrup. Roast in oven until soft and golden, approximately 10 minutes, checking to make sure the parsnips do not burn.

Meanwhile, in a large stockpot over medium heat, sauté pear and onion in remaining 2 tbsp. of olive oil until soft. Add roasted parsnips. Add broth and bring to a boil. Simmer, covered for 30 minutes. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Purée with a hand blender until smooth. Makes 8 to 10 servings. ■

The great inventors return, in farce and darkness

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Léon Theremin's name does not yet have the cachet of his inventor compatriot Nikola Tesla, whose moniker sits curb-side these days on sleekly shaped automobiles. Tesla's life in the United States began in the 1880s, with work for Thomas Edison, which led to substantial discoveries connected with AC current before his inventions related to wireless electricity and global communication systems failed to gain mass appeal.

Theremin's best-known invention is the musical instrument named for him. The theremin, which is played without the thereminist touching its controls, is among the first electronic musical instruments. Its two antennas sense the player's hands, allowing her to manipulate pitch and volume while sending the sound to a loudspeaker.

Sean Michaels' Giller Prize-winning novel Us Conductors opens late in the game, in 1938, with Léon Theremin locked in a cabin on the Stary Bolshevik, traveling back to his native Soviet Union. He considers the dark direction his life has taken and we get a lesson in how to play the theremin: "You wait to give the tubes the chance to warm, like creatures taking their first breaths. . . . You stand before a cabinet and two antennas and immediately the space itself is activated, the room is charged, the atmosphere is alive. . . . Raise the right hand first, toward the pitch antenna, and you will hear it: DZEEEEOOOoo, a shocked electric coo, steadying into a long hymn. Raise the left hand, toward the volume antenna, and you will quiet it."

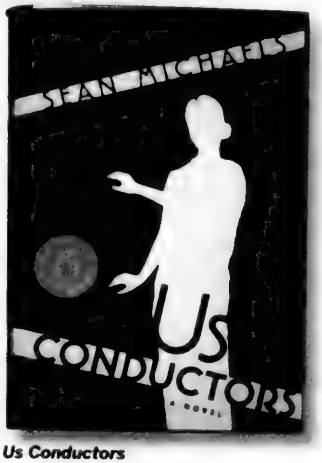
This semi-magical vocation never quite comes clear to the reader, though we meet dedicated thereminists and follow their bodies in motion. The machine and its eerie approximation of traditional musical sound remains foreign. But Michaels is expert at weaving a light-handed, fanciful narrative – an historical roman à clef – around Theremin himself, his undertakings as a Soviet scientist, which lead to fruitful years in flapper-era Manhattan before he is hauled back for a taste of the true awfulness of Stalin's gulag system.

Theremin's edge over Tesla as a fictional character is the fact that his many inventions include something so strangely ahead of its time as the theremin, with the potential to enchant, to attract a coterie of trainees and supporters who sought it out in community gatherings on the Russian steppe, at Carnegie Hall, as a complement to the excitements of jazz era New York or Ravel's Kaddish.

Though Theremin is sent to the United States as a Soviet agent, he finds plenty of time for performances, for tinkering with his instrument's possibilities, as well as for a failed effort to popularize the theremin via a sales deal with RCA. The Depression intervenes, as do murky machinations among the Soviet fixers for whom Theremin is acting as a front. He is packed off one day without the chance to tell his American wife where he is being taken. The Stary Bolshevik is his first European prison, and like a forgotten invention, he disappears into the gulag archipelago, among the hundreds of thousands of wasted lives sent east on the whim of NKVD agents.

The front two-thirds of Us Conductors is largely lightness and fun, a portrait of a naïf at loose ends in the big city, of the romances that come his way along with haphazard friendships. George Gershwin makes an appearance, as does Tommy Dorsey.

Michaels' style is hard to pin down as he follows Theremin's New York ups and downs. There is whimsy and wit, and a certain poetic otherworldliness to his descriptions of his hero's progress. At times one feels the influence of F. Scott Fitzgerald's



Us Conductors
Sean Michaels
Random House

1925 novel The Great Gatsby in Michaels' portrayal of speakeasies and their denizens' repartee:

"What are you doing on New Year's?" I asked.

"Haven't decided," you said. "Trying to find either the biggest bash or the smallest."

If the bulk of Us Conductors is a portrait of an innocent abroad in the big city, then its final movement is pure descent – Theremin, back in Moscow, is soon penniless, friendless, and because of a clueless request for help from an old contact who has become a major Soviet military figure, he is packed off to the edge of Siberia at Kolyma. Here Michaels has done careful reading in the historiography of the gulag, but his presentation – sharply imagistic and concise – bears a resemblance to Primo Levi's picture perfect presentation of his year of survival in Auschwitz. Michaels' presentation of gulag life is gritty, pungent, full of sharply drawn scenes that decry the totalitarian approach to men's lives without a hint of didacticism.

Theremin catches the interest of the man running the slave labour camp at Kolyma by suggesting a way to improve efficiency in the brigade of workers who use wheelbarrows to transfer loads over kilometres of rocky ground. Suddenly, he is released, into another chapter of indentured labour: a dark period under the watch of Lavrentiy Beria, head of the NKVD, seeking new kinds of listening devices to place in the embassies of the Soviet Union's many enemies.

Michaels gives Theremin the benefit of the doubt regarding these undertakings. The inventor recognizes Beria's fearsome authority as the darkest expression of Soviet policy. But after his release from prison in the late '40s it's understood that Theremin continued to work for the KGB on a range of spy-related technologies. This detail does not quite match the novel's portrait of the man as unlucky dupe.

On the subject of historical accuracy Us Conductors lets itself off the hook with an introductory epigraph: "THIS BOOK IS MOSTLY INVENTIONS." The reader appreciates the double-entendre, and yet, there is so much that is historically accurate in Us Conductors it is difficult to know when Michaels allows himself the freedom of invention.

The choice by the Giller Prize jury of Us Conductors represents a satisfying turn by the country's major literary prize. Michaels' novel is no breezy entertainment, although he does manage to present his fascinations with technology, music and political history using a wily and captivating voice. As a first novel Us Conductors is undoubtedly a breakthrough, representing the arrival in our literature of a voice worth following for its next idiosyncratic choices. ■

This gave Ross opportunities to photograph mass deportations, as well as time to bury his life's work of 6,000 negatives along with artifacts in the ground at 12 Jagielonska St.

After the Red Army liberated the ghetto in January 1945, Ross excavated the negatives. As, Matthew Teitelbaum, AGO director and CEO writes: "The images – and memories – were freed in parallel with the survivors in his community."

The images numbered more than the 877 ghetto survivors. Half of the negatives were darkened by moisture, many had deteriorated. In 1956, Ross and his wife immigrated to Israel and in 1961, his brutal ghetto images accompanied his testimony at the trial of Adolf Eichmann.

In 1987, Ross created a folio of select contact prints, most measuring four-by-six centimetres. Shot with 35 mm cellulose nitrate film, some of the prints show light swirls of degraded emulsions. The folio and 3,000 surviving negatives are now preserved at the Art Gallery of Ontario, a gift in 2007 from London's Archive of Modern Conflict.

On exhibition now at the AGO, Memory Unearthed: The Lodz Ghetto Photographs of Henryk Ross features over 200 images by Ross, the complete original folio along with a screen projection of the blown-up images, video clips of Ross testifying at the Eichmann trial, plus several contemporary images by Toronto photographer Yuri Dojc.

Ross's images are also compiled in a splendid publication edited by Maia-Mari Sutnik, AGO's curator of photography, special projects, that features insightful essays by Holocaust scholars.

En masse, the folio reads like a photojournalist's diary, a visual narrative of true moments captured spontaneously. Arranged as if without thought or sequential reasoning, the folio suggests that Ross aimed to project the extreme, incoherent juxtapositions of ghetto life.

While iconic Holocaust images typically focus only on the anguish, with heaps of bodies and emaciated concentration camp inmates, Ross portrayed the happy and sad elements of Lodz Ghetto life: the elite Jews reveling in ordinary lives, joyful celebrations and seemingly carefree garden strolls, as well people mired in misery, lining up at soup kitchens, digging their own graves, or huddled on a wagon en route to Chelmno extermination camp. Viewing Ross's images, it lurks in your mind that – for all the elite's perceived joy – by September 1944 their only road from the ghetto would lead to the camps.

Maia-Mari Sutnik, AGO's curator of photography, with Yuri Dojc. TOBY SALTZMAN PHOTOS

Every image tells a story. One contrasts two boys, one standing seemingly nonchalant as another lies on the ground, wasting from hunger. A suite of four pictures evokes emotions of joy turning to despair: depicting a mother tenderly kissing her baby and the father tickling the precious child's chin, it makes you wonder if they know their fate, or if they will lose the baby to Rumkowski's controversial call for parents to give up their children under the age of 10 for "resettlement."

As a child of parents who experienced the Lodz Ghetto, I found myself searching the folio for their faces. With these images, Ross validated stories that my parents had told of happy times and heinous, and authenticated the ghetto experiences for future generations. ■

Memory Unearthed: The Lodz Ghetto Photographs of Henryk Ross runs until June 14 at the Art Gallery of Ontario. For information: www.ago.net

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Ask Ella

Harassed in the workplace?

Ella Burakowski
ellacjn@gmail.com

Dear Ella,

I started a new job and feel very fortunate to have been hired. I enjoy my work, but am having trouble with two co-workers who have figured out that I'm Jewish, probably from my last name. These women have made a couple of comments which made me very uncomfortable. I was in the lunchroom getting a coffee when they both approached and asked me what my thoughts were about Jews killing Christ. I was shocked and quite shaken. I left and went back to work without acknowledging them.

On another occasion, when there were many people in the lunchroom, the conversation turned to food. Again, one of the women pointed me out and said maybe Janice can educate us on bagels. I don't want to fight. I just want them to go away. I don't want to stand out in any way.

Feeling Threatened

Dear Feeling Threatened,

Your problem is serious and common enough that there are laws in place to protect you. In Ontario, about three-quarters of all human rights claims come from the workplace.

You are the victim of anti-Semitism in the workplace. I realize that you're new in the company and don't want to make waves, hoping these two will just go away. That's not going to happen.

Take steps to protect your comfort and safety at work. You have that right, the same as they do. If you don't want to confront them directly, arrange a private meeting with the head of HR and explain your situation. State that you don't want any problems or to stand out, you just want to do your job and be respected and feel safe.

We live in a culturally diverse country, and I'm sure your workplace is made up of people from many different backgrounds. Suggest that your company have a zero tolerance policy for hate. They should distribute a statement or handbook explaining the requirement to respect diversity and practise tolerance in the workplace. They should already have a policy in place, but it needs to be reviewed with all employees regularly. Bill 168 in Ontario, which addresses workplace violence and harassment, states: "Regularly train and educate employees at all levels to treat others respectfully and professionally."

On a personal level, you can tell these two to please not refer to your religion in any way. Ask that they respect your boundaries and say that you will do the same. However, it sounds like these women are troublemakers, and it may not be that easy. Don't be alone with them, and make sure there are always witnesses to their conversations with you. Above all, make sure you are safe.

Dear Ella,

Ever since the terrorist incident in Paris, I've felt very uneasy, not only for myself, but for my children. My son works for a Jewish organization and I worry about him. My daughter is a teacher, and I worry about her safety as well. The 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz has just passed, and I can't help think that the world has learned nothing. I'm not looking for answers, just venting and hoping that I'm not alone in my feelings.

Looking over my Shoulder

Dear Looking over my Shoulder,

I can assure you that you're not alone in your uneasiness.

You watch television, read news stories and are bombarded with stories of innocent people going about their day-to-day activities, being targeted. You are also living in a time where information is everywhere. You can't turn your computer on without reading or seeing information and videos of terror. ISIS beheadings have become a regular visual, as have other terror incidents. It's very difficult to avoid, but when you rationalize that the motive of the terrorist is to scare you and the motive of the news outlets is to keep up ratings, you may have a more logical answer to why you live in constant worry.

Don't ignore it, but don't focus on it, either. Focus instead on your family, your life, your routine and try not to let other peoples' hatred and agendas rule your life. ■

Ella's advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

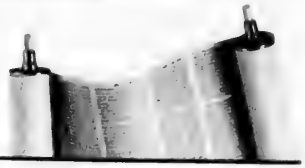
Parshah

Mishpatim | Exodus 21:1 - 24:18



Rabbi Ilan Acoca explains why now is a good time to reconnect with God through nature
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl urges us to employ our sensual imagery to imagine God
Rabbi Catharine Clark analyzes why the Torah reminds us about Passover right now

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Mishpatim deals with Jewish civil law.

Rashi notes the parshah starts with the verse, "And these are the ordinances that you shall place before them." The conjunction "and" indicates there's a connection between this chapter and the previous one, which describes the giving of the Ten Commandments. Just as those commandments were given at Sinai, so, too, were these.

The Ben Ish Chai says the word har (mountain) is composed of the Hebrew letters hay and resh. The two letters preceding har are kuf and daled. The letters following the word har are vav and shin, thus making the word kadosh, holy. By receiving the Torah on Mount Sinai, Israel was surrounded by holiness. HaShem similarly described Israel as holy while they resided near the mountain, as the Torah tells us, "you shall be a priestly kingdom to me, a holy nation."

It seems the Ben Ish Chai describes holiness as being close to God or spirituality.

It's interesting to note that the holidays of Tu b'Shvat, Purim and Pesach, which follow each other on three consecutive months, fall on the 15th, the 14th and the 15th of the month, respectively.

The word yad, hand in Hebrew, equals 14 and one of the names of God equals 15. The message of these three holidays is that we must see the hand of God and connect to Godliness.

Tu b'Shvat represents the beginning of the year for trees. It's a good time to reconnect with God through nature. On Purim, we read Megillat Esther, where the name of God is never mentioned. The message is that even when God seems to be out of the picture, He's always in the picture. On Pesach, we celebrate the Exodus, and we remember that God took us of Egypt.

The message is clear: in order to become holy, we must connect with God in all aspects of our lives. Doing so makes life more fulfilling and meaningful. ■

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

Rabbi Nathan Lopes Cardozo states: "Seeing and visualization stand at the heart of Greek culture, [but] hearing plays a central role in the Torah." Much earlier, the German-Jewish historian, Heinrich Graetz, wrote, "Paganism sees its god, Judaism hears Him." But is this actually the case?

Although later in Exodus we are told that God said, "You cannot see My face, for a mortal may not see Me and live" (Exodus 33:20), in our Torah portion we read: "Then Moses and Aaron, Nadav and Avihu, and 70 elders of Israel ascended; and they saw the God of Israel... Yet God did not raise His hand against the leaders of the Israelites; they beheld God, and ate and drank" (Exodus 24:9-11).

Abraham Ibn Ezra explained that they saw God in a prophetic vision, while Maimonides, who battled stridently against all anthropomorphic language, declared, "All this refers to intellectual apprehension and in no way to the eye's seeing" (Guide of the Perplexed, I:4). But scattered throughout the Bible, there are hints of a visual tradition that is emphasized in the powerful images found in Jewish mystical literature against which Maimonides struggled.

In Anim Zemirot (Hymn of Glory), the 12th-century Ashkenazi pietistic poem, Rabbi Yehudah HeHasid, writes, "I will recount Your Glory, though I have not seen You/ I describe You though I have not known You." Then we find a proliferation of visual images of the Divine based on Song of Songs and other biblical and rabbinic texts: "His hair is curled and black"; "dazzling and ruddy is He"; "His head is like pure gold."

Once we know that all descriptions of God are mere metaphors, then we are free to use the gamut of our sensual imagery to imagine God. "All my bones shall declare, 'Who is like you!'" ■

Rabbi Catharine Clark

I was not born to a Jewish family, and it was a long decade between when I converted and when I met the man who would become my husband. For the first half of that decade, reading Parshat Mishpatim always made me anxious.

Parshat Mishpatim informs the Israelites that three times a year they shall hold a festival for the Lord. The stressful part for a single Jewish woman who converted to Judaism was the first holiday mentioned – Passover. Even though we read Parshat Mishpatim in the middle of winter and don't celebrate Passover until spring, this passage signalled that it was time to find a place for seder. With no family of my own and no Jewish family to go home to, it was always my fervent hope that invitations for both seders would be forthcoming by Purim at the latest.

Fortunately, my friends came through. Some years I would go to seders in their apartments or dorm rooms. Other years, I would venture to the suburbs to celebrate Passover with a friend and her parents, aunts, uncles and cousins. One year, a friend proposed that we host seders together, one night at my apartment, one night at hers. Never have I felt more certain of my place among the Jewish People than I did that evening as I welcomed friends and their friends into my home for my first time hosting seder.

Now I understand that Parshat Mishpatim reminds us of Passover's approach to inspire us, not scare us. If you have always hosted a seder, the parshah teaches that it is time to buy more folding chairs, double recipes and expand the guest list. If you have never hosted a seder, the parshah teaches you to team up with a friend and make a seder for yourself and anyone you know who needs a place for one. ■

Play carries a message of social justice

Quinn was inspired by the mystery surrounding the Bronte sisters, but for her, the play also touched on issues of sexual and domestic violence – areas that she's passionate about addressing. The Sound of Cracking Bones also carries with it a powerful message of social justice and this production is affiliated with The Roméo Dallaire Child Soldiers Initiative.

Throughout the run, Proof Media for Social Justice's Child Soldiers: Forced to be Cruel photo exhibit – which illustrates the prevalence of child soldiers in different areas of the world – will be on display in the Theatre Passe Muraille lobby.

For director Van Burek, the play is about sparking discussion on this troubling global issue. And with her portrayal of eight-year-old Joseph, Quinn is part of that conversation. ■

Pleiades Theatre's production of The Sound of Cracking Bones runs at Theatre Passe Muraille from Feb. 14-28 in English and from March 3-7 in French. Visit www.pleiadestheatre.org

William Schabas: No evidence of bias against Israel

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

William Schabas, the Canadian international law professor, resigned last week as head of a UN panel investigating possible war crimes during last summer's Gaza conflict.

Schabas, 64, stepped down Feb. 2 after Israel provided evidence to the UN Human Rights Council in Geneva that he had authored a seven-page legal opinion on behalf of the PLO for which he was paid. Israel contended the contract with the PLO was a serious conflict of interest in the investigation. Schabas responded that he had acted with full "independence and impartiality" as head of the inquiry, but was resigning to prevent distractions from the panel's findings, scheduled to be published next month.

Schabas was replaced by commission member Mary McGowan Davis.

Following his appointment last August, Israeli officials and Jewish groups accused Schabas of anti-Israel bias. Schabas has accused Israel in the past of war crimes, and in 2011, he said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "should be in the dock of an international court."

Israel refused to co-operate with the investigation, though some Israelis did testify before the committee members.

In response to Schabas' resignation, Netanyahu urged the UN to shelve the report. Schabas responded to Netanyahu and similar statements from Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman, calling them "masters of extravagant and ridiculous statements."

Schabas spoke to The CJN last week via email from London, England, where he teaches at the University of Middlesex.

Why did you resign at this time? I understand it is connected to your work for the PLO, which created a conflict of interest. Why did you not disclose that at the time you applied for the position?

I did not apply for the job. I was approached by the UN to do it. There was no question of disclosure of previous activities, because my record was well-known within the UN as well as by the states that were consulted on my appointment, including Israel. Earlier in the year, when I was being considered as a candidate for special rapporteur on the occupied territories, Israel was quite active in its opposition to me. Israel knew all about my past and my activities. The record is public. And Israel has a rather effective intelligence service, too.

William Schabas

In retrospect, do you believe it was a mistake not to do so, or do you take the position that a lawyer doing work for a client should not disqualify him from this post?

My work for the PLO consisted of being sent five questions by email and providing a written response. I was given no documents by the PLO. I have had no relationship with it either before or after this brief request for an opinion in October 2012. I was not involved in advocacy or in campaigning for the PLO. I merely gave a technical legal answer to technical legal questions. There are many, many examples of judges sitting in cases where at some point in the past they were involved in providing legal advice to one of the parties.

At the time the inquiry was established, there was quite a bit of criticism of the UNHRC for being biased and of yourself for also being biased, or at least having the appearance of bias, based on your comments on Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Israel in the past. What do you say to those criticisms?

The word "biased" gets thrown around a great deal in this discussion. Some people seem to think that it is the same thing as having an opinion that is contrary to their own. But bias refers to someone who is asked to provide an impartial judgment and who is incapable of doing this because of personal views. Someone without bias is someone who is capable of putting their personal views aside in order to reach an objective, neutral and impartial position. There is lots of evidence that, in the past, I have expressed views that do not correspond to those of the government of Israel. But I can only be accused of bias if it can be shown that I cannot detach myself from those views. Is there any evidence that I cannot? I don't think so. I think most of those who have criticized me for "bias" really only want to have a commission composed of people with views that lean in their direction.

> There is lots of evidence that, in the past, I have expressed views that do not correspond to those of the government of Israel. But I can only be accused of bias if it can be shown that I cannot detach myself from those views.

Since your appointment, a good number of respected experts in international law said you should resign. How did you feel when colleagues such as Irwin Cotler, Alan Dershowitz, Joseph Wieler and others said you should not head the inquiry?

I was disappointed to receive criticism from Irwin Cotler, who is an old friend for whom I have always had great respect, as well as Alan Dershowitz and Joseph Wieler, although I cannot say I was surprised. Like me, they have their own strong views on the relevant issues. When they judge me, you might ask if they are really capable of a neutral, balanced, objective and fair determination, or if their own vision is clouded by their political perspectives. Maybe they suffer from the same faults that they attribute to me.

I understand the inquiry will report in a month or two. That suggests most of its work has been done. Is that correct? And if so, doesn't your resignation at this late stage taint its findings, whatever they may be?

The commission has made no findings yet. It finished its hearings and meetings in late January, and provided a deadline of Jan. 31 for written submissions. The work of writing the report is only beginning.

The inquiry was criticized from the start for its terms of reference, which focused on alleged war crimes, abuses, etc. in the Palestinian territories. That omitted war crimes committed by Palestinians in Israel and suggested the one-sided nature of the inquiry. Did the inquiry look into Palestinian violations of international law? In what areas?

From the very beginning, the three commissioners indicated that they were going to investigate all allegations of violations, regardless of the combatants who were thought to be responsible. For example, when they met representatives of UN Watch in September 2014 they made this very clear. There has been considerable publicity in Israel about the victims of mortar attacks in the region near the Gaza border who travelled to Geneva to meet with the commission and talk about what had happened to them. I believe they reported that they were welcomed with courtesy and that the commissioners were very interested in their accounts. This is well known in Israel. I don't know why the question keeps arising.

Anything you wish to add?

I would like to make it clear that I do not accept the allegations made against me by Israel. A problem was created on Feb. 2 when the Human Rights Council decided to investigate the complaint by Israel against me. The process that was to start by seeking a legal opinion from UN headquarters in New York was likely to take a matter of weeks. I think that when the impartiality of a member of a tribunal is challenged, it is normal for the matter to be determined as a matter of priority. Its other work cannot continue until that issue is resolved. In my judgment, the consequence of the decision to investigate the complaint would have been a suspension of the work of the commission.

This would probably have meant that it would not be able to present its report to the March session of the Human Rights Council. My judgment, then, was that the best way to resolve this impasse was for me to withdraw. That way, the commission can get on with its work without the disruption and distraction caused by the complaint against me. ■

When Winnipeg had too many shuls

Backstory

ALLAN LEVINE

There's an old joke about a shtetl in the Russian Pale of Settlement with a population of only 100 Jews but 125 synagogues – and every Jew in the village was a synagogue president! It's only a joke, yet it gets to the heart of the passionate and often divisive religious questions that permeate modern Jewish history, everywhere from Minsk to Manitoba.

Since the mid-18th century, when Moses Mendelssohn and other like-minded intellectuals formulated the Haskalah (Jewish Enlightenment) and launched the great debate about what it means to be a Jew in the western world, Diaspora Jewish communities have been torn apart on issues of religious observance and ritual.

In the early 1880s, this contentious dispute was played out on the Canadian prairies in Winnipeg, then a frontier city with a total population of about 26,000. That number included less than 1,000 Jews, most of whom had arrived from the Pale in 1882 and 1883. Apart from not being able to speak English, their most distinguishing feature was their poverty. Yet, given the significance of the synagogue in Jewish daily life, within a short time, Winnipeg had a dozen synagogues.

There was the Beth El Synagogue, established by the handful of English Jews – the community's so-called aristocracy – who wanted to show that Jews could be part of mainstream society. At the synagogue's inaugural service on July 11, 1884, Rabbi Joseph Friedman from Montreal delivered the sermon in English, setting the tone and style of the city's first Reform service. For good measure and to display their true Anglo-Canadian spirit, the congregants sang God Save the Queen before the prayers had concluded.

These Reform rituals proved too much for some of the more Orthodox members of the new synagogue, who departed to form their own congregation, which they called Beth Israel.

Not to be outdone, several groups of Russian Jews established their own, more traditional-style synagogues as well. There was Anshay Roosia (People of Russia) above a soap factory on Henry Street, headed by young clothing merchant Ben Zimmerman, a Russian Jew who came to Winnipeg after living in Philadelphia. There was also a small synagogue called the "Milchige," since everyone, from the president of the synagogue on down, were milkmen. Yet another was the Shtall Shulach or "Little Stable Synagogue," so named due to its location beside a livery barn.

With so few Jews in the province, it was clear that Winnipeg's small community could not sustain so many synagogues. Finances and common sense had to take precedence over religious principles. The result was various mergers during the latter part of the 1880s.

Winnipeg's vibrant and diverse Jewish community reached its peak in the early 1960s with a population of about 19,400, along with many synagogues, kosher butchers and schools that catered to every Jewish ideology on the spectrum. Not every Winnipeg Jew was religious, but nearly every Jewish family belonged to a synagogue. At some synagogues, you had to book a bar or bat mitzvah five years in advance.

But times have changed. The city's Jewish population has declined to less than 15,000, and as is the case for Jews everywhere, belonging to a synagogue is not as important as it used to be. Partly it has to do with the expense of membership and High Holiday seats, but mostly it is about the secularization and assimilation of Jews into Canadian society.

In Winnipeg, this has meant a drastic reduction in the number of synagogues. A decisive moment occurred in 2002 with the merger of three Conservative synagogues into the Etz Chayim Synagogue. Now, the Etz Chayim and Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, established in 1889 and the city's largest Conservative synagogue for many years, are exploring the possibility of a merger. Both synagogues have older buildings that require costly upgrades, as well as dwindling and aging memberships. Both, too, have been fighting an uphill battle to make their institutions more relevant in the lives of their members. ■

A Shoah relic is recovered, and newsman didn't make it all up

Torah scroll drum heads to Israel

A Holocaust commemoration group brought a drum from Poland to Israel that belonged to a Nazi sympathizer and was made from a Torah scroll. The drum was found last month by volunteers of From The Depths, a Shoah commemoration group, in the estate sale of a former Hitler Youth member who lived in a village near the city of Lodz. Jonny Daniels, Israeli founder of From The Depths, bought the drum and, after consulting with the Israeli chief rabbinate on how it should be treated in view of religious laws on handling Holy Scripture, decided to incorporate it into a traveling exhibition the group is preparing. Daniels said its parchment is "incredibly well-preserved."

At least he's got Lebanon

An Israeli army officer who was on a helicopter with Brian Williams during the Second Lebanon War told Bloomberg Feb 9 the NBC News anchor's reporting of the incident "was representative of the experience." Williams, who the Washington Post reported has given several different versions of the 2006 flight, was suspended as anchor of the NBC Nightly News after admitting he was not on a helicopter that was struck by a rocket-propelled grenade in Iraq in 2003. His accounts of incidents elsewhere are also being questioned. In a 2007 interview, he said that during a flight over northern Israel during Israel's 2006 conflict with Hezbollah, there were "rockets passing just beneath the helicopter I was riding in." Jacob Dallal, a reserve major in the IDF's media liaison, confirmed there was Katyusha rocket fire beneath the craft.

Brian Williams was truthful about some stuff.

Ethiopian Jews still struggle

Prof. Gil Troy ("Made-in-Israel success stories at IDC," Feb. 5) commends the Interdisciplinary Center for its Ethiopian scholarship program as an example of the joyous welcome accorded Ethiopian Jews. By doing so without reference to the hardships the vast majority continue to endure, he unwittingly distorts the true state of affairs.

Their path toward acceptance into the mainstream is an ongoing battle marked by discrimination and racism. Tzago Malko, an Ethiopian Jew and former director of Israel Radio's Reshet Alef station, who fills the No. 3 slot in Moshe Kahlon's Kulanu party list contesting the upcoming elections, puts it quite succinctly. "To this day I still get asked, 'Lady, I need cleaning twice a week. Are you available?' Yes, I'm available for cleaning, but not houses. I'm ready to clean up corruption, to clean up the view of the other as inferior because of his/her name, accent or skin colour."

Examples of residential, job and even school discrimination are legion. It is but one more journey this extraordinary community has yet to traverse. To only speak of the remarkable few wholly out of context of the humiliation visited upon the many is to dodge our responsibility to double up in our efforts for klal Yisrael.

Free speech has limits

I believe that freedom of speech does not exist unless it applies to the right to speak without fear ("University free speech can be unsettling," Feb. 5.) However, freedom is not license, nor absolute. Therefore, there are limits. The obvious one is shouting "fire" in a theatre. Not so obvious is targeting a minority group with abusive slander and threats of violence that cause harm by perpetuating negative myths and stereotypes. That is hate speech, which in Canada is a crime.

Certainly the university environment encourages all kinds of rebellious behaviour and language, and so it should. Yet even there, abusive behaviour, both verbal and physical, should not be condoned. That kind of behaviour on university campuses, including York, is what many of us object to.

Balance good news with bad

I know that, unfortunately, domestic abuse exists in the Jewish community, but I could not believe that it was as prevalent as claimed in the articles by Sheri Shefa. So I did my own research in the Orthodox Jewish community to which I belong. Although the professionals were not sure of the statistics, they corroborated that abuse is much more widespread than the average person would imagine.

However, I would caution the community to balance the bad with the good. The Jewish haredi community runs unbelievably dedicated volunteer organizations such as Bikur Cholim, Hachnassat Kallah, and Hatzolah. We now have one more difficult challenge to take on.

Preserving a piece of history

I have recently returned from a trip to Berlin to deliver a silver Torah shield that has been in my family for close to 200 years. After extensive research, I decided that the Berlin Jewish Museum would be the most appropriate home for the Torah shield, which was made in Dresden, Germany, around 1712.

I recall that for all the years that we had the Torah shield in our home, it was kept in the original wooden box in a cupboard. And it was so until 2009, when my parents moved to Baycrest and I became the keeper of the Torah shield.

Realizing that this Torah shield has a special history and is a fairly unique piece of Judaica, and that the Berlin Jewish Museum has a mission to commemorate Jewish life over time in Germany, I decided to place it there. This museum has a collection of family memorabilia, documents and any kind of item that would reflect personal histories and life in Germany.

For generations to come, my sons, their families and progeny will be able to visit this museum and see our Torah shield on display together with other family items, that will reflect the story of their heritage.

The museum is still in the process of gathering items from families with German origins and welcomes contributions. I recommend a visit. ■

Rambam Health Care Campus
Prepared for all Imminent Scenarios

According to the latest news, Iran and Hezbollah are planning an imminent joint invasion of Israel's northern Galilee region. This reality has forced Rambam Hospital, to make equipping the Sammy Ofer Fortified Underground Emergency Hospital an urgent priority.

The largest structure of its kind in the world, sets a new standard for safe care in times of extreme emergency. This visionary structure converts from a 1,500-vehicle parking lot into a 2,000-bed emergency hospital fortified against conventional and non-conventional weapons.

As Rambam serves over two million residents in the north of Israel, we must be prepared to safely provide the highest level of medical care, especially in these times, the need is more urgent than ever.

We cannot do it without your help.

Your gift will help fund one of the most advanced initiatives of its kind in the world and serve as a lasting reminder of your solidarity with Israel at the time of their greatest need.

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Can we Jews ever be happy?

Some branches of Judaism emphasize joy in daily life and practice, and having so much sadness in our history makes it important to cherish true simchah moments

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LIBRARY, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Scheim: As we enter Adar, we are reminded of the talmudic injunction to make this a month of celebration. But easily overlooked is the reality that the discussion in Tractate Ta'anit is primarily focused instead on the intrinsic sadness of the month of Av – "Just as we minimize our joy when Av arrives, so too, when Adar arrives, we increase our joy." Being happy in Adar because of Purim becomes an afterthought in the greater context of the pains and tribulations of Jewish history.

My years in the rabbinate have taught me that happiness does not come easily to us. We traditionally wish each other at Rosh Hashanah a "shanah tovah" – a good year, rather than a happy new year – because goodness, unlike happiness, is always attainable.

But the question remains: why do we Jews have such a hard time with happiness?

Rabbi Finegold: While I acknowledge it certainly appears the way you describe, I often think much of it depends on perspective.

I would venture to say that your observation does not appear to be true among younger populations, or among different branches of Judaism. I used to joke that in our previous congregation, which skewed much younger than our current one, the two-day-a-year Jews were ones who attended on Purim and Simchat Torah. There is also the fact that certain branches of Judaism – Chassidism, Neo-Chassidism, Jewish Renewal and others – place great emphasis on joy in their daily lives and practice. Having met many of these people, I can certainly say they have no difficulty being joyous.

In the two dicta you mentioned from the Talmud, the default position is that of joy, not sadness. The Talmud does not instruct us to increase our melancholy in Av and decrease it in Adar. To me this seems to indicate that the authors of the Talmud, and presumably the greater population, might have been quite a happy bunch.

Rabbi Scheim: It is reassuring that there are communities where simchah overtakes sadness, which, I would agree, is in keeping with our tradition. But our happiness is rarely unbridled. Thus the joyous holiday of Purim is preceded by the Fast of Esther, Yom Ha'atzmaut, by Yom Hazikaron (Israel's Remembrance Day). Likewise, wedding ceremonies include the breaking of a glass.

I do not criticize these memorials – they are critical to our identity. But having so much sadness in our history makes it incumbent upon us to cherish the true simchah moments, and to seek out the simchah shel mitzvah, the joy of Jewish involvement. I fear that the joy of mitzvah often eludes us. Those steeped in tradition and observance can be overcome by the minute details of the law and miss its inherent joy.

On the other extreme, many simchah guests sit in synagogue with pained expression, as if longing to be anywhere else. They have not (yet) had the opportunity to experience the joy that comes from involvement, engagement with tradition and serious identification with the holiness of Jewish time and space.

Rabbi Finegold: You seem to point out that we are good at tempering our joy with a dose of sombre reflection. What if we try to temper our moments of sadness with touches of hope and joy as well?

People coming to services exclusively for Yizkor could be reminded that we say Yizkor on joyous holidays, and those days should be celebrations as well. The experience of a family sitting shivah and speaking animatedly about the wonderful memories they have of the deceased can be powerful and is, I think, precisely the reason we are compelled to spend the week after a death surrounded by friends and family.

Imagine if we as rabbis become known as peddlers of joy rather than those who preside over long boring services. A friend of mine is doing just that in Omaha, Neb. Without removing any of the core features of the Shabbat morning service, he tripled his attendance by changing the format of the service to mimic a talk show, complete with monologue about the parshah and a featured guest for an on-the-couch-interview about a timely topic.

This is not to say we all need to become comedians. But hopefully the mood of our communities can be shifted with us leading by example. ■

The challenge of sustaining Jewish day schools

Jewish education in this country took a significant hit last week when the Ottawa Jewish Community School (OJCS) announced plans to close its high school program. In a letter, Aaron Smith, president of the OJCS's board of directors relayed the unfortunate news: "A recent examination by OJCS leadership… has determined that the high school is not financially viable."

"Put simply," he added, "not enough families are choosing to send their children to grades 9 through 12."

The high school needs "a minimum additional subsidy of $250,000 on an annual and ongoing basis, on top of regular operating costs, to avoid a deficit," Smith explained. It requires 50 students a year to be sustainable, but this year just 24 are enrolled, and the school was expecting total enrolment of only 20 students for the next scholastic year. (The elementary school program, meanwhile, "is strong, sustainable, and is receiving continued support," Smith noted.)

The continuing viability of Jewish day schools is one of the greatest challenges facing Canadian Jews, and while the situation in Ottawa is a particularly dramatic example, declining enrolment is an issue across Canada. As Daniel Held, executive director of the Julia and Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education in Toronto, and a CJN columnist, admits in this week's paper, the issue "keeps me up at night."

According to Held, there are two issues at play: Affordability and sustainability. "Day school financial sustainability requires a longterm plan to ensure that revenue covers costs," he writes. "Affordability necessitates a demonstration of the value of day school vis-à-vis the cost of tuition."

In the wake of its closure, the OJCS administration has vowed "to begin a community engagement process to understand what the community is looking for in a supplementary high school program." Supplementary Jewish schooling may not be as effective a tool of communal engagement as full day school, but, like summer camps, it can offer an affordable Jewish experience. It seems clear that's an option more and more families are looking for.

Similarly, youth groups can also contribute significantly to Jewish education. And, as reporter Lila Sarick documents in this week's CJN, many Jewish youth groups are exploring new ways to attract kids. Modern Jewish youth groups, Sarick argues, "have to offer more than playing Ping-Pong in a shul basement on Shabbat afternoon."

And yet, youth groups face their own issues when it comes to remaining relevant: "Groups which focus on a specific niche," Sarick writes, are facing "a challenging landscape." The groups that appear to be having the most success in recent years, including NCSY, are responding by "making partnerships across denominations and reaching beyond the traditional high school age to younger students and alumni." That's a model that might have once seemed unthinkable; now it appears to be working well.

The closure of Ottawa's Jewish high school underscores the serious challenge of sustaining Jewish day schools in Canada. As we work to solve that problem, it's worth remembering there are educational alternatives to day school. The community must invest time and resources to make these options attractive to young Jews, and affordable for their parents. The future could depend on it. ■ — YONI

China's Harbin City courts the Jews once again

Ng Weng Hoong

When Chinese tour guide Eric Liu found out that Jews were fleeing Paris and other European cities to escape their worsening anti-Semitic environment, he asked if they might want to "return" to his city of Harbin, once among the most vibrant and important Jewish centres in the Far East.

"We welcome them. They are smart, educated and hard-working, and will be a very positive influence for the city," he said as he recounted the role of Jewish businessmen, musicians, writers, bankers and engineers in making this northeastern Chinese city one of the country's most prosperous early last century.

The Jewish story is particularly fascinating and tragic as they were the only foreigners to share the same fate as Harbin's Chinese residents in being racially targeted and robbed by Russian and Japanese occupying forces that were competing with other European countries to colonize China in the first half of the 20th century.

At its peak in the 1920s, the prosperous Jewish community in Harbin numbered 25,000, according to Dan Ben-Canaan, an Israeli academic married to a Chinese woman who has been living and teaching in the city since 2002. Most of the Harbin Jews had fled from Russia, and made their fortune from developing the city into a major centre trading and supplying coal, timber, soybeans, grains and foodstuff from China to Europe.

The first wave of Jews arrived shortly after 1898 when Russia had constructed a railway to connect this resource-rich corner of the country with Russia.

In China's frontier environment with no history of anti-Semitism, the Jewish community thrived through hard work and their knowledge of international commerce. They were also free to practise their way of life and religion as the Chinese viewed them no differently from other foreigners. In 1903, the community grew sufficiently to establish the Harbin Jewish Association and the city's first synagogue. At one point, nine of the 17 city's council members were Jewish and had a role in building Harbin's main commercial street, hospitals, schools, cinemas, concert halls, a soup kitchen and even its main brewery. Many of these buildings remain intact, with the still-vibrant 1.4 kilometre-long commercial street linking the railway station to the riverbank, a legacy of Harbin's rise.

But Europe's problems eventually befell China as more Russians and remnants of the defeated czarist army fled to Harbin following the 1917 Russian Revolution. Hungry, poor and armed, the new arrivals began targeting Harbin's citizens especially its well-off Jewish community. Many young Jews who had grown up in the city's relatively sheltered environment encountered acute anti-Semitism for the first time in their lives.

The power struggles that followed took its toll on both the Chinese and Jews. Some of Harbin's Jews began selling off their assets to mark the first major wave of emigration.

In 1931, the Japanese became the dominant power. Though they generally treated the Jews well, the strain of collaborating with the Japanese Imperial Army which was allied to Nazi Germany and was conducting biochemical experiments on the Chinese population, became too much of a moral burden. Many Jewish businessmen packed up and left China for good.

The Jewish population went into terminal decline after Mao Zedong conquered China in 1949 and appropriated all private property.

In 1963, the last Jewish family left, ending the community's six-decade involvement in Harbin's colourful, turbulent and brutal history. The community's last resident, Hannah Agran, died in 1985, leaving behind a treasure trove of documents, photographs and memorabilia in her apartment that she had collected from other Harbin Jews. While her relatives and friends left, she insisted that she would die in the city that she was born in.

Harbin's Central Street. Inset: A plaque outside the restored synagogue of Harbin

"Her belongings were removed and locked away by the central government. Together with the local government and various groups, we've been lobbying Beijing to open up the archives, but to no avail," Ben-Canaan said in an interview.

China has been quietly growing trade and investment with Israel and Jewish businesses. From about $2.6 billion (US) in 2005, Israel's bilateral trade with China had grown to $15.59 billion in 2013, just slightly below the $16.3 billion worth of business conducted with the United States.

Given recent growth rates, China could soon overtake the United States as Israel's largest trading partner, said Ophir Gore, the head of trade mission at the Israeli embassy in Beijing. With China hungry for Israeli water expertise, information technology and farming know-how, the government of Israel has set a target to double its exports to the Asian nation over the next five years.

As if catching up with its own past, Harbin is eager to attract a new wave of Jewish businesses and settlers to replicate the success that the earlier legendary generation had brought. Mayor Zhang Xiaolian is leading a delegation to Israel this month to invite Israeli investors to his hometown.

Against the bright lights and connectivity of Beijing, Shanghai and Hong Kong, Harbin stands little chance of pulling in the heavyweight investors. But just like a century ago, events in Europe might once again shine favourably on this almost forgotten corner of China. ■

Not your bubbie's youth group

'It can't be just sitting and chilling... You've got to make it more exciting'

LILA SARICK

At left, members of Bnei Akiva organized a challah bake last summer in honour of Israeli soldiers fighting in Gaza. At right, members of NCSY participated in a painting night for Tu b'Shvat.

Jewish youth groups have to offer more than playing table tennis in a shul basement on Shabbat afternoon, says Rabbi Glenn Black, who remembers doing exactly that in his Montreal synagogue as a kid.

Today, Rabbi Black heads NCSY Canada, a Jewish youth group that has so thoroughly re-invented itself, that even its name, which once stood for National Conference of Synagogue Youth, has been changed. Now, the organization, one of the largest Jewish youth groups in the country, goes by just its initials.

"Across Canada, a lot of programs are shul-based. In Toronto, that model's shifted away from being shul-based. You do not see that many teenagers in shuls today," says Rabbi Black. "In the old days, kids hung out at the shul playing Ping-Pong. Today, you have to be much more creative."

For NCSY, and many of the other youth groups in Canada, that has meant making partnerships across denominations and reaching beyond the traditional high school age to younger students and alumni.

"It can't be just sitting and chilling," says Liza Rozen-Delman, director of Camp Hatikvah and Young Judaea in Vancouver. "You've got to make it more exciting, you've got to up the ante."

In Vancouver, she runs three programs a year and pitches them at younger kids. "The moment they have their own car, they're not wanting to go to Jewish youth groups."

Youth groups generally operate below the media's radar, but in December, the Conservative movement's United Synagogue Youth made headlines when its leaders voted to drop a ban on interdating for its youth executive.

The change affected no more than about 100 young people, but it provoked a much wider debate. Clearly, while youth groups may have more difficulty attracting young people in an age of shrinking religious affiliation and competing interests, they still carry a lot of influence.

Across the country, BBYO (which was formerly called B'nai Brith Youth Organization) and NCSY are the two powerhouses, with representatives in many Jewish communities and attracting kids across religious denominations.

In the Toronto area, NCSY took its quest to make Orthodox Judaism attractive to non-observant kids into 14 public high schools, where it offers cultural clubs. After school, NCSY's Torah High offers subsidized high school classes on Jewish subjects to about 350 teens. About 90 per cent of NCSY's membership in Toronto comes from non-Orthodox homes, said Rabbi Black.

Last summer, NCSY staff went to Camp Northland-B'nai Brith, to reinvigorate its Jewish programming. They also met dozens of campers, whom they later invited to the group's Shabbatons and courses.

Across Canada, the program is growing: a second couple has just been added to work in the Vancouver office, said Rabbi Black. Between 2,200 and 2,500 teens nationally participate in NCSY programs.

Rabbi Black praises his staff, who host Shabbat programs in their homes and engage with young people at summer camps and high schools. "Kids like the warmth, they like the encouragement. They don't get that everywhere," he says.

Another key to NCSY's success is its deep subsidies. Torah High charges students $499 per credit, but it costs the organization $1,800. Its Israel summer trips are also significantly cheaper than those offered by other organizations.

About 90 per cent of NCSY's funding is generated locally (with 10 per cent coming from the Orthodox Union). "I spend 70 to 80 per cent of my time thinking about affordability," says Rabbi Black.

BBYO, which is a non-denominational youth group, is also on a growth curve in parts of the country.

In Winnipeg, where BBYO has little competition from other youth groups, membership has grown to 186 members this year, up from 137 the year before, says Gabi Kneller, youth and BBYO co-ordinator.

BBYO "is such an ingrained thing. Everyone's parents were in BBYO, everyone's grandparents were in BBYO."

Kneller's own parents met in BBYO, she says, and she grew up as a leader in the movement herself.

The greatest challenge BBYO faces is explaining the intricacies of youth groups to immigrant Jewish parents in the city, she said.

Kneller also reaches out to summer camp and synagogue directors, inviting their youth leaders to come on board and help plan events, such as a recent Shabbaton that attracted 80 teens.

"It brings everyone together. I would think it's an advantage to be pluralistic," she says.

Youth groups that focus on a particular niche, either political, such as the Zionist Hashomer Hatzair, or religious, such as the Reform movement's North American Federation of Temple Youth (NFTY) or USY, face a more challenging landscape.

Both NFTY and USY have taken a similar tack, attracting youths who do not necessarily belong to a congregation and reaching out to capture the attention of younger middle school students before they make decisions about how to spend their time outside of school.

York University student paper is deaf to Jewish concerns

Danielle Shachar

Two weeks ago in The CJN, a group of past and present directors of the Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University aired their thoughts on a recent campus controversy. In the aftermath of the tragic attacks in Paris, an editorial in the Excalibur, York's student newspaper, ignored the deadly assault on a kosher supermarket, outrageously equated ultra-Orthodox Jews who refuse to sit next to women on airplanes with Islamist radicals who murder innocent civilians, and twisted the attack on Charlie Hebdo to condemn Zionism.

The authors of the CJN piece argued that the university ought to be a place for the free exchange of ideas and that York's thousands of Jewish students and other community members should be content to simply condemn articles that incite hatred against them.

I agree with the first sentiment, but as a Jewish student at York who wants to feel safe on her own campus, I strongly disagree with the authors' laissez-faire approach.

The offensive and insulting piece on the Paris terrorist attacks was hardly the newspaper's first misstep as far as Jews and Israel are concerned. Over the past few years, Excalibur has consistently given front-page coverage to the bigoted campaign to force York to divest from the Israeli economy and boycott interactions with Israeli professors, students and universities. In addition, the paper has repeatedly carried opinion pieces by Hammam Farah, a notorious anti-Israel instigator at York who was even banned from campus for a few months due to his inability to obey York's very lenient rules for organizing protests.

Excalibur has repeatedly failed to question or fact-check ridiculous assertions in its anti-Israel pieces. And at the same time, it has refused to carry pro-Israel articles written by students, claiming that they are "biased." Jewish students have been robbed of their ability to reach the student body with their side of the story – in essence, their right to free speech was unfairly suppressed in favour of those harassing our community.

The authors of the Feb. 5 CJN submission also claim that the situation at York is little different from other Canadian universities, but this is simply untrue. It is hard to imagine another Canadian university where Jewish staff and students would be besieged in a Hillel office by a mob of violent Israel-haters, as occurred at York in February 2009.

Excalibur is not a private publication that lives or dies based on the quality of its journalistic output. Rather, as the official campus newspaper, it derives much of its revenue from fees collected from each York student by the university administration along with their annual tuition payments. This fee is mandatory. There is no way for a student to opt out. Hence, Jewish and pro-Israel students at York are being forced to prop up a newspaper that fans the flames of hatred against them.

Student newspapers at other Canadian universities honour students' role in keeping them afloat by remaining accountable to them. For example, the Varsity, the University of Toronto's campus publication, hosts twice-yearly meetings for students to air their feelings about the newspaper and cast binding votes on its activities. Excalibur does no such thing and gives every appearance of being a self-replicating echo chamber disconnected from the students who pay its bills and whom it is supposed to serve.

According to York University guidelines, organizations such as Excalibur that benefit from mandatory student contributions must be held accountable to those very same students, but these guidelines are not being strictly observed. Jewish students at York and other members of the community can help us fend off these attacks on our beliefs and our identity not by "censoring" Excalibur, but by personally informing York's administration that it cannot continue to aid the newspaper in hoarding student fees while it remains deaf to their legitimate concerns. ■

Balancing school financial sustainability and affordability

Daniel Held

A year ago, concurrent to my starting work at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education, I published a report on Jewish day school financial sustainability and affordability for the Jewish Funders Network and the Avi Chai Foundation. On several occasions, I've shared ideas from the report in this column. During this past year, working alongside Toronto's day school leadership, some ideas in the report have been reinforced and others have shifted in my thinking. What has become clear is that ensuring long-term sustainability will require disruptive changes to the ways we currently operate.

Day schools face two interrelated but distinct challenges: affordability and financial sustainability.

Affordability is the individual parent's perception of cost and value – knowing that what their children are receiving is worth the investment in tuition. Affordability factors in both the perceived value of the school and the cost of tuition in relation to household income.

Sustainability is the long-term financial viability of the school –balancing its budget year after year and being able to withstand short- and long-term financial challenges, including the steady demand for increased financial assistance and the need to invest in a quality educational program.

A school could be affordable (with low tuition and high perceived value) but not sustainable. Similarly, it could be sustainable with high tuition (and sufficient families willing to pay), but not affordable to the breadth of students it hopes to reach. Day school financial sustainability requires a long-term plan to ensure that revenue covers costs. Affordability necessitates a demonstration of the value of day school vis-à-vis the cost of tuition. It also involves a realization that even with high perceived value, some families will require tuition assistance. The challenge is a delicate balancing act between sustainability and affordability.

In Toronto we are blessed to have one of North America's most robust affordability programs. Decades ago, the leadership of UJA Federation dedicated itself to ensuring that day schools would be affordable to the widest swath of students. This manifests in an annual allocation of $10 million, matched by schools, that assists 2,300 students each year. While the program is not perfect, it goes a long way toward making school affordable.

What keeps me up at night is the financial sustainability of this program and of our system. Year over year, increases in the costs of day schools significantly outpace increases in inflation and household income. As a result, each year, tuition bills take up more and more of the average family's disposable income and our affordability program, like those across North America, endures greater strain.

I believe we can address the current issues of affordability through interventions on the revenue side of a school budget. We've seen these kinds of interventions through endowments, middle income programs, annual development, etc. The more I am kept awake at night thinking about sustainability, however, the more I come to the realization that a sea change can only come through a change in schools' cost structures.

Upward of 70 per cent of a school's budget is spent on human resources – teachers, administrators, support, etc. A meaningful reduction of expenses necessitates rethinking the structure of our schools and what teaching and learning looks like. These changes, however, can only take place with the recognition that perceived value is the most important predictor of enrolment and a critical ingredient in parents' calculus of affordability. Our schools must be top quality.

Rethinking the cost structure of Jewish day schools requires an audacious embrace of out-of-the-box thinking balanced by a healthy dose of conservatism that is necessary in any educational change.

In collaboration with professional and lay leaders in Toronto, we've started this thinking, but it will take many more dreamers and doubters to develop the models that will propel day school into a sustainable future. ■

Do new anti-terror measures go too far?

Jean M. Gerber

"Pray for the welfare of the government, for were it not for the fear of it, men would swallow each other alive" (Pirkei Avot 3:2).

Let me tell you a true story.

In the early days of Simon Fraser University, during the roiling '60s, SFU had its student demonstrations, its quotient of radical organizers. Today most are retired boomers, no longer on the barricades. But in those days, demonstrations and demonstrators were a sign that the enemy was at the gates – of the university, that is.

So the RCMP, ever attuned to the trends of the day, began surveillance of, among many other groups, students and their campus organizations. I quote from Steve Hewitt's Beaver article of August/September 2002, "Spying Goes to College," written in the fresh aftermath of 9/11.

"The list of materials passed on to Ottawa in 1970 included... an assessment of the Canadian University Press, a mention of Marxism at the University of Waterloo, a report about an SFU history-student organization, derisive comment about an all-female student executive at Brandon University [!], and descriptions of the formation of a Jewish student group at SFU and a gay organization in Vancouver."

I'm telling you this because that "Jewish student group" was us: my husband and I, along with a few Jewish SFU students and some other friends who wanted to enhance their knowledge of Judaism, Zionism and social justice. God knows what the Mounties made of our meetings, or how they even knew about them.

Hewitt's article chronicles the decades in which the RCMP and the Canadian government assiduously pursued what they felt were dangers to Canada from below, including student conspiracies they believed would undermine, if not overthrow, the established order. What was at the base of all this? Only slowly did it become apparent that the enemy, as Pogo said, was often us.

Now, in 2015, we have fresh anxiety. Our emotions have been stirred by events of the past weeks: deaths in Paris; arrests in Canada of suspected or avowed jihadist cells; and accusations and the creeping fear that, once again, Jews in Europe face a rise in anti-Jewish attacks. Can it happen here?

In Canada, two soldiers have died, although it's pretty clear the men who killed in Ottawa and Quebec were mentally unstable, and had, if anything, used the Internet to turn themselves into radicals. They weren't "turned" by fiery local imams, but by their own mental anguish.

This might have triggered a call for better mental health treatments, but no.

Never mind that recent arrests of alleged terrorists came because current laws produced their capture. We're told we need new ones, even more intrusive and stripped of the protections we expect as citizens of a democracy. Yes, we need the government to protect us from those who wish us harm, but we also need to trust the democratic processes guaranteed by law.

Do we teeter now on the edge of decisions we may regret, such as passing more and more laws that attempt to protect us from every conceivable (and some not-so-likely) terror attacks? Ottawa has reportedly spent $1 billion just on a security building in Ottawa. Many more billions will be spent on security services.

Are we so fearful that we will easily give up any sense of protection from the mistakes that zealous security agents can make that we will override common sense?

Since 9/11, the United States has barricaded itself behind growing security walls, ever more intrusive and constitutionally precarious. Like our sister to the south, is Canada ready to toss overboard freedoms and protections that we hold as the right of citizens living in a democracy?

Our government should be more than a fence keeping us from attacking each other. It should be dispenser of justice – surely the higher honour.

Or is this just an election ploy? That would be cynical beyond belief. ■

A defiant Iran continues to pose a nuclear threat

Paul Michaels

No one can say the warning signs weren't everywhere.

That is, no one can say the entire international community wasn't warned repeatedly that Iran was playing games and having its way with the P5+1, led by the United States, in the now twice-extended nuclear talks now scheduled to end this summer.

According to highly informed experts, despite all the international community's efforts to prevent it, Iran will almost certainly, before long, be a breakout nuclear weapons state.

While the barbarity of ISIS in Syria and Iraq has grabbed recent headlines, Iran – a more dangerous threat to international peace and security, given its aggressive designs from Lebanon to Iraq to Yemen, its terrorist plots in Europe and Asia, and even in the Western Hemisphere (see Argentina) – continues to push ahead with its nuclear program.

A quick review: more than a decade ago, after Iran was repeatedly caught cheating on its obligations as a member of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), including developing secret centrifuge sites, the UN Security Council passed a series of six resolutions demanding that Iran stop enriching nuclear fuel or face sanctions. Insisting it had a "right" of enrichment under the treaty, which it doesn't, Iran was subjected to Security Council-imposed sanctions.

Iran continued to defy the UN, its nuclear weapons inspectors, and both the United States and the European Union, which imposed even tougher economic sanctions against Tehran.

Only in November 2013, when these sanctions began to bite, did Iran agree to hold talks with the five permanent Security Council members plus Germany (hence the P5+1) to reach what was called the Geneva Interim Agreement. According to this plan, Iran would roll back its enrichment program in return for limited sanctions relief.

But instead of insisting, as the Security Council resolutions demanded, that Iran cease all enrichment activities, the P5+1 only required Iran to convert 20 per cent-enriched nuclear fuel to five per cent, but allowed it to continue to enrich fuel to this level – thus, in effect, accepting Iran's "right to enrich" while trying (ineffectually, as it turned out) to persuade Iran to diminish its centrifuges from nearly 10,000 to 2,000. Iran insists it will limit only the efficiency, not the number, of its centrifuges – which can quickly be reversed.

The interim plan, begun in January 2014, was intended to lead to a comprehensive agreement by last July, but the deadline was extended first to November and then to June 30, 2015, with a framework agreement to be in place by March.

Almost no one expects this to happen. The options are a further extension or the American's acceptance of a bad deal.

Iran is seen, foremost by Israel, as simply playing for time. Leveraging a loophole in the interim agreement that allows for research and development "practices," Iran is reportedly hard at work on advanced centrifuges that can dramatically accelerate the enrichment of nuclear fuel to weapons-grade at a time of Iran's choosing, thus giving it a quick "breakout" capacity to produce a nuclear bomb.

Since the interim agreement didn't address Iran's nuclear warhead research (made off-limits by Iran to IAEA inspectors) or its ballistic missile development, Tehran has managed to counter interference in its overall nuclear program. Limited sanctions relief is worth several hundred million dollars a month to Iran while it pushes ahead with a nuclear weapons program in which it repeatedly – and disingenuously – denies any interest.

Summing up where things stand, Emily Landau, Israel's leading expert on arms control, recently wrote: "Negotiations so far show that Iran's steadfast defiance in resisting any significant concessions with regard to its nuclear program has been met time and again with concessions by the P5+1."

The "P5+1" might better be seen as a short-hand for the U.S. administration that is dedicated to nuclear talks with Iran while it also, in effect, counts on Tehran to fight ISIS in Iraq – yet a further dangerous development, especially for Israel. ■

An annual subsidy of $250,000 is needed to avoid a deficit.

Ottawa to close its only Jewish high school program

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

A unanimous decision by the Ottawa Jewish Community School's (OJCS) board of directors will see the city's only Jewish high school program phased out by 2017.

"An extensive examination by OJCS leadership, which included a study by the school's sustainability committee, has determined that the high school is not financially viable," Aaron Smith, the OJCS board president, said in a Feb. 10 letter to parents about the decision to close the high school.

"Put simply, not enough families are choosing to send their children to grades 9 through 12. This has been a challenge in the high school over [its] 20-year existence."

In 2006, Ottawa's Jewish elementary school, Hillel Academy, amalgamated with Yitzhak Rabin High School and the new school was renamed the OJCS.

Despite having both schools under one roof, the high school continued to struggle to sustain itself.

Smith said it would require a minimum annual community subsidy of $250,000, on top of regular operating costs, to avoid a deficit.

"We require a minimum of 50 students to be sustainable given our current cost structure. This year, we have 24 students, and next year, at best, we expect 20 students total enrolled," Smith said.

GUEST VOICE

Save my school!

Ella Sabourin

My name is Ella Sabourin. I'm in Grade 10. I've attended a Jewish school for 11 years. I am writing this article right after finding out that that journey is over. The Ottawa Jewish Community High School, formerly called Yitzhak Rabin High School, is rejecting all new applicants for the coming school year. Only current Grade 10 and 11 students will be allowed to finish, which would leave the entire high school next year with 12 students, give or take.

I have witnessed this high school's struggle for students first-hand and have participated in the constant efforts to increase attendance within the Jewish community. It breaks my heart how many people have passed it up without a second thought.

Of my Grade 8 class of 37 kids, only six of them continued on to the high school. I've published articles in the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin, created advertisements, and made a Facebook page (www.facebook.com/hoojcs) to raise awareness of this school and the wonderful opportunities it provides.

Now, I'm reaching out to the international Jewish community. I'm making one final effort to save something beautiful and to provide a Jewish high school to the community of Ottawa.

This support isn't only because of religious beliefs. I'm a Reform Jew, and I don't go to synagogue nearly enough. It's because this school is something special. It's such a shame to watch it crumble and be powerless to hold it together.

When I first heard it was closing, I didn't think of what I'd do or where I'd go. All I could think of was an image in my head of an empty funeral. You see, even though this will devastate those who have experienced the former Yitzhak Rabin High School first-hand, the vast majority of the Jewish community in Ottawa won't even notice the change.

So, why am I reaching out to you, the international Jewish community? Well, I've always been an idealist. I'd like to raise funds for the Ottawa Jewish Community School through the Jewish community at large.

I know the odds are against me, but I'd feel better going out having tried my best.

I got this idea from Don Draper, the character on Mad Men, who also put an article in the news when he was in a tricky predicament. He said, "If you don't like what's being said, change the conversation."

I've created an account for the school on Go Fund Me, which is the world's No. 1 fundraising site. You are welcome to donate at www.gofundme.com/saverabin. The money that is donated will be used to sustain the school. If enough is provided, the seven Grade 8 students who were planning to attend the high school will be able to.

Every donation is appreciated. ■

Canadians to run in Israel for kids with special needs

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Some 50 Canadians will join more than 300 runners from around the globe to represent Shalva in the annual Jerusalem Marathon next month.

Shalva is one of Israel's premier institutions that cares for and supports children with special needs and their families. The Hebrew letters shin, lamed, vav, heh comprising the name Shalva stand for "liberating the child with special needs and their family." In Hebrew, the word shalva means, "peace of mind."

Team Shalva, now in its fifth year, unites runners of all backgrounds and ages in preparation to walk, run, or both, in the upcoming Jerusalem full, half, 10-km, and 5-km runs. Participants can also take a Shalva child on an 800-metre community race. Runners are raising money for Shalva – the Association for Mentally and Physically Challenged Children in Israel.

"The Canadian Friends of Shalva will have 50 participants lacing up to run the marathon this year including mother-daughter and father-son teams," said Johanna Brooks, executive director of Canadian Friends of Shalva.

"Bnei Akiva Schools of Toronto are the first organized school group from Toronto participating. They have close to 25 participants who have helped raise awareness of Shalva and the community through their students and parents."

This year's run will take place March 13 and raise funds for Shalva's therapies and programming. Shalva's children also train for the marathon.

With awareness and commitment, Team Shalva's spirit and passion continues to grow.

"Four years ago, we had 17 international runners. One year later we had 50. Last year, there were 170, and this year, Shalva has over 300 runners from Israel and around the world," said Brooks.

Dedicated Toronto supporter Marla Buck has participated in the marathon year after year.

"We think hours of training, rest and proper nutrition prepare us to run a marathon, but there is no preparation for the marathon of disability.

"We run surrounded by 5,000 fellow Jews, a tapestry of life and history, and a people who challenge adversity daily. Blind veterans tethered to fellow soldiers, army platoons with packs on their backs, and flags waving proud, all running with the kids of Shalva, as they burst with joy and elation. These are our trainers and our role models. They teach us the lessons we think we teach them," Buck said.

Toronto participant Lisa Erlick has raised $19,000 so far for Shalva.

"I lost a child to cancer. I am dedicating this run/walk in memory of my beloved son Evan who, less than a year after having his bar mitzvah in Israel, succumbed to the brain tumour that took his life," Erlick said.

"The whole idea of going to visit Shalva, raising money for them and pushing a child in a wheelchair resonated with me. Evan would be very proud," she added.

"If you raise a minimum amount of $3,600, Shalva will cover your round trip airfare and hotel stay during the marathon, from March 12 to March 15. Participants will attend a pre-race party where they will meet fellow runners from across the world, enjoy the music of a Shalva band made up of Shalva children and a post-race victory party, including a weekend Shabbat experience," Brooks said

Shalva was founded in 1990 by Kalman and Malki Samuels after their experience raising their son, who was rendered blind, deaf and hyperactive by a routine vaccination at the age of 11 months.

Believing that the care of children with special needs should not be left to the family alone, Malki and Kalman tried to create a therapeutic environment in which children with special needs could thrive and grow. From humble beginnings, today Shalva has become a leader in disability awareness and intervention in the Middle East. All programs and services are provided free of charge.

"For the parents of special needs children, our race is run every single day. There is no Shabbat. There is no vacation. There is no time off from training, not even for an injury," said Nicole Schiavi Jansezian, a Shalva mother who participates in the marathon every year. ■

Agency raises funds for affordable housing

sshefa@thecjn.ca

A fundraising initiative by the Kehilla Residential Programme will enable more Torontonians to enjoy affordable housing.

Kehilla, Toronto's non-profit housing agency, runs a rental assistance program that provides up to $300 per month to help families in need meet rental costs.

Kehilla currently supports 26 households that are forced to pay more than 35 per cent of their gross incomes on rent.

Nancy Singer, Kehilla's executive director, said that in an attempt to add more funds to the rental assistance program and potentially help more families struggling to make ends meet, the agency has reached out to successful community developers for help.

"We put together a list of developers who have done well in the community, and the ask was to give back to the community. It is also a product that they know really well - housing," Singer said.

"They were extremely supportive."

To date, the campaign has secured 19 gifts of $10,000 each, substantially increasing funding for the program.

Singer said what's great about the initiative is that it provides "immediate gratification.

"The advantage of a rental assistance program is that you can help people immediately," she said.

"We're not waiting five years, eight years, to build an affordable housing unit that can cost a lot of money and time," she said, adding that the $190,000 that was raised for the rental assistance program will help sustain the program for more people.

"We have nearly 100 people on the waiting list and it grows every day."

Another positive development at Kehilla saw 24 people placed into affordable housing units at the Heathview, a new rental building in the heart of the Forest Hill Village.

Singer said that through an agreement with the City of Toronto, Kehilla worked closely with Morguard, a real estate investment company, to provide 24 affordable units at the Heathview for 10 years.

Bachelor units at the Heathview are available for rent for about $1,300 a month, but under the agreement with Kehilla, clients pay $725. The market value for one-bedroom units runs between $1,600 and $1,800 a month, but Kehilla clients pay $950.

"But after 10 years, the rent could go up 30 per cent a year," Singer said.

She said half the residents of the subsidized units are referred by Jewish Family & Child, and the other half come from Kehilla's waiting list.

Late last year, Kehilla was also involved in addressing a "crisis" following the closure of a North York Jewish nursing home called Ahavas Achim Retirement Home.

"We called an emergency meeting, and we had everybody who has anything to do with housing in the area," Singer said.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Kehilla were notified about the closure in October and learned they only had until the end of 2014 to find new housing for 23 residents, most of whom have long-standing mental illnesses including depression, bipolar disorder and schizophrenia.

After collaborating with a number of Jewish community organizations, along with the Community Care Access Centre, an agency that delivers home and community health care, all of the 23 residents were successfully transitioned to alternate housing and care sites by the end of the year.

"Although this was a retirement home, what we discovered is that quite a number of the residents were under 60, living with challenges and inappropriately housed," Singer said in a statement.

Nancy Singer, executive director of Kehilla

"There is a serious lack of supportive housing for this population that ends up in seniors homes or other inappropriate facilities."

Singer said that although Kehilla had a productive year, the housing agency still faces many challenges.

"We're in a [good] position now because we have a premier who gets it, we have a mayor who gets it. We probably need a change at the federal level on social housing policies, but it's very hard to move forward," she said.

"It hard to move ministries forward to get them to work together to use funding more efficiently. There are no new dollars. We know that. Everyone is dealing with budget restraint... but we expect more efficient use of existing dollars and collaboration." ■

Talented Israeli hockey player moving up quickly

plungen@thecjn.ca

David Levin

If you check the bios of current NHL players, you'll find places of birth that would have astonished pro scouts from days gone by. Forget Timmins and Flin Flon. Today's hockey players come from places like Margate, Fla., Phoenix, Ariz., and Las Vegas, Nev.

Not a snow-covered mining town among them, so if we're talking sub-tropical locations, why not throw Netanya in northern Israel into the mix?

David Levin, 15, hails from that ice-challenged locale, but his superior talent and dedication have vaulted his name to the top ranks of potential draftees into the Ontario Hockey League (OHL), one of Canada's three premiere major junior leagues.

As a highly regarded right winger with the Don Mills Flyers AAA minor midget team, Levin is eligible to be drafted into the OHL, where he'll develop his skills with the world's best junior-aged players. It's a stepping stone – a tall one, with many chances to stumble and fall – to the National Hockey League.

But Levin is determined to be among the best in his sport. He's been like that since he was eight years old and got his first exposure to North American hockey on TV back home. His father, Pavel, had immigrated from Latvia, where he played pro soccer and was an avid sportsman. One evening, David asked his father what sport he was watching. "It's the NHL," his father told him, "the best hockey league in the world."

The next day, he told his dad, "That's where I want to play, too." Today he's just as determined: "I want to go as far as I can and make my dream come true, to play in the NHL."

Many kids share the dream, but as a potential OHL first pick, Levin is on the right track. At the Titans Minor Midget Tourney, in December, he won the scoring title, with seven goals and seven assists in eight games.

Last week the Flyers, the top-ranked minor midget team in Ontario, began a seven-game series with the Toronto Marlboros in the GTHL championship. Levin got a goal. In March, the Flyers, the number 1-ranked team in Ontario, will participate in the OHL Cup, a showcase for top players on 20 top minor midget teams, which attracts OHL scouts by the bushel.

"I have to show up and play good," he said.

Darren Ferris, Levin's agent, is confident Levin will be an early selection in the OHL draft. Ferris said he's been around lots of top players who've gone on to careers in major junior and the NHL. Levin handles himself the same way as the stars, he said.

Ferris marvels at Levin's ability, pointing out he's only been playing on ice for three years, yet he dominates play. "He's a very special player. He sees the ice very well," he said. "If you look at the skill level of kids eligible for the draft, he's the most talented."

When you speak to Levin, the teen sounds mature beyond his years. He's willing to put in the hard work to excel, and he's got the mental toughness to overcome obstacles.

He's always been a top player. In Israel, he played in his father's inline hockey league and excelled. From his home in Netanya, he made it to the Canada Centre rink in Metullah only a few times a year, so most of his hockey experience was the dry-land variety. Three times at inline tournaments in Europe he was named MVP.

From his performance in inline tournaments, it was clear he had special talent.

Three years ago, Levin moved to Canada to develop those skills. He lives with his aunt and uncle. The transition from skating on asphalt to ice was difficult, but manageable, he said. The transition from life in Israel with his parents to life in a new country, with a new culture and language was more difficult. And he was only 12.

David communicated with his folks at home via Skype and he visited regularly, but it was still very difficult, said his aunt, Alla Tovberg. "It was a very hard decision for his mother," Tovberg said.

Not speaking English was a barrier as well. "It was a very hard adjustment, the new environment, the snow. It was completely different than Israel," she said. "And he had to adjust to a new family."

Levin's uncle, Yafim, drives him to games and practices, and Alla marvels at how dedicated David is to his sport.

He's on the ice five times a week, adding gym training to his routine. He's always thinking of ways to help his team. And even in the summer, when he takes time away from hockey, he's never too far from it. "There's not a day that I'm not doing something with my stick," he said. ■

Getting teens' attention is tough

Although denominational affiliation is shrinking, being part of a synagogue framework can have its advantages, the leaders find. "It gives young people a real voice, especially in synagogue. There's no curriculum telling them otherwise," says Josh Dubell, regional adviser for NFTY – Northeast Lakes Region, which includes Reform synagogues in Ontario, except Windsor, and some in upstate New York and Cleveland.

In Toronto, a recent event attracted 70 kids, a small turnout given the large Reform synagogues in the city, but the largest numbers seen in about seven or eight years, Dubell said. The Toronto area's ranks have been bolstered by new Reform synagogues downtown and in the northern suburbs, which have started chapters.

For USY, synagogue affiliation lets young people become involved with a congregation's children and seniors, breaking down generational boundaries and appealing to teens who need to earn community service hours, says Andy Pascoe, United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's youth chair for Eastern Canada.

About 150 youths come to at least one USY event during the year, a number that has remained fairly steady over the last few years, he says.

Especially in Toronto, getting teens' attention is tough. They can be involved in Jewish schools and camps, as well as have a wide range of options for socializing.

"We don't get the numbers coming out to conventions, but that's true for all [denominations]," says Pascoe. "But the kids are just as committed and just as engaged."

While some youth groups have altered their names and their orientation, others have found success by remaining resolutely unchanged.

Two of the oldest Zionist youth groups, the modern Orthodox Bnei Akiva, in its 80th year and the left-wing Hashomer Hatzair, which recently celebrated 90 years, still hold weekly meetings that attract a steady core of youths.

Between 40 and 50 kids, many of whom are Israelis or the children of Israeli immigrants, meet Saturday afternoons for games, holiday celebrations and discussions, says Hashomer Hatzair's Uri Ron Amit, director of Camp Shomria, the movement's Ontario summer camp.

In Montreal, where the chapter closed 25 years ago, local leaders are being trained and a parents committee has been started in the hopes of reviving the chapter.

Promoting a progressive, Zionist movement is an uphill struggle, says Amit. "We do love Israel and we sometimes look at Israel in a critical way," he says. With its emphasis on youth-led programs, Hashomer Hatzair "has the opportunity to provide kids with the peer group to explore around Zionism and progressive Judaism.... We provide this platform to explore these questions with their peers."

Religious Zionism is the driving force behind Bnei Akiva, which holds weekly programs in three Toronto synagogues, as well as in Hamilton and Montreal, says Jonny Lipczer, Bnei Akiva shaliach.

Like many youth group leaders, he grew up in the movement, which had a life-changing effect on him.

"One of the beautiful things about Bnei Akiva is the presence of shlichim, somebody who has a real care and passion for Israel," he says. "I made aliyah from Britain because of the impact my shaliach made on me." ■

JNF recreates biblical agriculture in hills of Jerusalem

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Gidi Bashan

If you look out your window, you might forget that Tu b'Shvat is the new year for trees in Israel, not snow-shovelling season.

With that in mind, Gidi Bashan donned his gatkes and made the trek to snow-covered Canada to tell one and all about the work Keren Kayemet L'Yisrael (the Jewish National Fund) does in recreating biblical-era agriculture in the Holy Land.

In Sataf, in the Jerusalem Hills where Bashan lives, he and another family tend the biblical park that was established in the early 1980s to mimic the agricultural processes of 2,500 years ago.

There they grow figs, olives and grapes, three of the seven species of plants that are mentioned in the bible. (The others are barley, wheat, pomegranates and dates.)

Bashan relies on modern science – to determine that the current crops are genetically close to those grown in ancient times – and the ancient technique of terracing the land to avoid soil erosion, to recreate farming as it might have been in biblical times.

"We do a lot of what our ancestors did to eat," he said. "That's what grows in our fields."

The result is a biblical park that attracts 500,000 visitors every year and which educates Israelis and others about the Jews' ancient connection to the land.

Bashan, KKL's community and forest Sataf project director, was in Toronto last week as part of a two-week cross-Canada tour that took him to Jewish communities and schools in Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Windsor, London, Halifax and Ottawa. His visit was part of JNF Canada program to familiarize Canadian Jews and others with some of the work done by the organization in Israel, and demonstrate JNF does more than plant trees in Israel, said Franklin Simkevitz, executive director of JNF Canada's Ontario region.

In addition to reforestation, there's work in land use, water preservation and providing Israelis with cycling routes throughout the country, he said.

Cycling is another one of Bashan's passions. In addition to his work in ancient agriculture, he was responsible for providing the country with its first dedicated, environmentally friendly bike trail.

Growing up in Kiryat Chaim, along Haifa Bay, Bashan was an avid cyclist. When mountain biking really took off in Israel around 15 years ago, Bashan went along for the ride.

As the sport grew in popularity, people would use dirt roads and then hiking trails for their mountain biking needs. Then they'd start hacking their way through undeveloped forested areas, causing environmental and even archeological damage. So KKL (JNF), with its mandate to preserve Israel's forests, got involved and Bashan created the first groomed single track mountain bike trail in the country.

Since 2006, KKL has added 1,200 kilometres of single track trails and it manages another 1,000 kilometres of dirt road tracks.

One of the more popular biking trails was developed with financing from Toronto developer Joe Lebovic. It runs 125 kilometres between the port of Tel Aviv and the Jerusalem zoo.

Another even longer trail is designed to run from Mount Hermon in the north to Eilat in the south. So far, only 300 kilometres are open, running from Mitzpeh Ramon in the Negev to Eilat. That trail is a joint project of KKL, the Ministry of Tourism and the Israel Nature and National Parks Protection Authority.

With Israel's biking season lasting nearly the entire year, some 100,000 cyclists take advantage of the country's trails.

A lot of what the KKL/JNF does is unfamiliar to Canadians, including non-Jewish Canadians, said Simkevitz. So while in London, Bashan addressed members of the city's urban forest strategy department.

"It's telling people there's more to Israel than the conflict you read about in the paper," he said. "We just give them a completely different perspective." ■

Barrie synagogue gets new spiritual leader

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Audrey Kaufman

One doesn't normally equate Simcoe County, just north of the Greater Toronto Area, with Jews.

But Barrie's Am Shalom Congregation, in existence since 2004, is about 75 families strong, and, as the only synagogue in the area, it also serves Muskoka, Collingwood, Newmarket, Innisfil and Beaton.

Since Jan. 1, the Reform congregation has had its first full-time cantor and its first full-time spiritual leader, Audrey Kaufman.

Kaufman, who lives in Thornhill and commutes to Barrie for services, has worked as Am Shalom's part-time cantor for the past 10 years or so, after being invited by synagogue president Stephen Sperling to lead services one Shabbat.

Kaufman was offered a three-year contract to be the shul's full-time cantor and spiritual leader after the congregation's former rabbi, Rabbi Ilyse Glickman, moved to the United States.

"I'm going to be a sort of jack of all trades," said Kaufman, who previously worked for 13 years as the cantorial soloist at Toronto's Temple Sinai Congregation.

She also spent 16 years working as a High Holiday cantor at a synagogue in the United States.

Kaufman said she will work to make the services, which are a mix of Hebrew and English, accessible and to ensure congregants understand the Torah on a deep level.

"I tell them there is no soap opera, no miniseries, that compares to the Torah," she said. "I want them to understand that it's not just an ancient scroll, but that the lessons of the Torah apply to everything we do in our life today. Sometimes, at the end of the service, I'll ask, 'Is there anyone here who didn't learn something today? And if they say no, I'll say, 'Let's stay and do the service again," she chuckled.

"The community finds Audrey very enlightening, very warm and approachable," said Rosa Ringhofer, Am Shalom's vice-president and a resident of Barrie.

"She's very involved, passionate and has a keen interest in the different things being offered at Am Shalom, like the sisterhood, brotherhood, adult education programs, religious school and social action."

Kaufman has been working closely with the religious school associated with the synagogue – 30 students are currently enrolled – bringing her knowledge of Torah study and music.

She is also working with the synagogue's Shirat Am Shalom Choir, teaching new music and encouraging them to become more involved with Shabbat and holiday services.

Ringhofer said about 20 to 30 people typically attend Shabbat services, while around 60 come to special holiday events such as those tied to Purim and Chanukah, and more than 100 – members as well as guests and other cottagers from the area – tend to come to High Holiday services.

Am Shalom was founded by developer Henry Bernick, who grew up in the Barrie area and subsequently moved to Toronto.

Wanting to give back to Barrie's Jewish community, he donated land for the synagogue and this, plus additional donations, allowed the synagogue to be built.

Prior to 2004, a group called the Simcoe County Jewish Association operated for about 40 years, its members meeting for holiday services and events at each other's homes and in rented premises.

Until 2003, the community was guided, for 13 years by Rabbi Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus of Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom.

Am Shalom's members, who typically range from age 30 to 60, are primarily individuals from the GTA who have moved further north for "the lifestyle," Kaufman said.

"There are more and more Jews living up north," she said. "People who want to get out of the hustle and bustle of the city... they love the outdoor recreation, the slower pace."

Many of them are still active professionals, she said, including doctors, dentists and lawyers.

"It's the same cross-section you'd find in any shul," she noted, "just on a smaller scale."

She added, "Barrie is the best-kept secret."

Kaufman's long-term goal is to help grow the congregation and spread the word about Am Shalom, possibly through joint ventures with other synagogues. "We have a vibrant, upbeat service. When you leave, you feel really good, really spiritual, warm and accepted," she said. "I want to do my part in imparting that type of feeling." ■

Sephardi event remembers Hyper Cacher victims

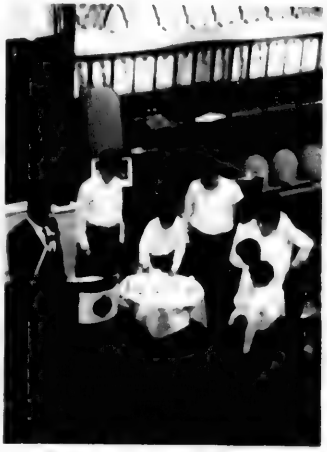
sshefa@thecjn.ca



Students from Joe Dwek Ohr Haemet Sephardic School light memorial candles.

In a religious ceremony to mark the shloshim – the 30th day of mourning – in honour of the four Jewish victims of the Paris terror attack at the kosher supermarket, about 100 people gathered at Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill on Feb. 10 to pay their respects.

On Jan. 9, four Jewish men, Johan Cohen, Yohav Hattab, Philippe Brahan and François-Michel Saada, were gunned down by an Islamic extremist as they shopped in the hours before Shabbat, said Guidy Mamman, chair of the event organized by the Communauté Juive Marocaine de Toronto (CJMT), in partnership with a number of Sephardi congregations.

"Tonight, we, the Sephardi Jewish community of Toronto, are marking this tragic milestone," Mamman said.

Following the lighting of memorial candles by Joe Dwek Ohr HaEmet Sephardic School students, as well as prayers and the Mourner's Kaddish, a number of community and political leaders addressed the gathering about the terrorist attacks in Paris last month and the threat that terrorists pose to those who adhere to western values.

York Centre MP Mark Adler began by saying he is "absolutely fed up" having to speak at events that commemorate innocent victims of terror, and that the world needs to fight back.

"You know, our Prime Minister Stephen Harper said a few weeks back that radical jihad had declared war on us… They said they are coming to the West to drink our blood… If there is one thing we can count on the terrorists to do, it's to keep their word. That is why we, not only Jews, but all people of good conscience, must stand united, must stand together to fight this scourge, to fight these barbarians and to take action," Adler said.

He added that Canada's government has committed its forces to fight Islamic State (ISIS) in northern Iraq, and introduced legislation in Parliament to fight terrorism, both homegrown and abroad.

Vaughan mayor Maurizio Bevilaqua said it is important to respond as a united front when tragedies like this occur.

"This world has been around for millions and millions of years. Billions of people have inhabited this earth for centuries upon centuries and isn't it truly miraculous that we have found each other here tonight… to be here for each other?"

When B'nai Brith Canada CEO Michael Mostyn took to the podium, he referred to an interview U.S. President Barack Obama gave earlier that day. In it, Obama characterized the attack as a random act of violence against "a bunch of folks in a deli in Paris."

"This morning, when Obama's press secretary was supposed to clarify the statement, he repeatedly denied that the deli was attacked because it was a kosher deli," Mostyn said.

"I am here to tell you tonight that we cannot and will not accept any denial of the indisputable fact that this violence was perpetrated by radical jihadists upon our brothers and sisters in France."

Gad Alon, Israel's consul in Toronto, said the challenge with jihadists is that they can't be dealt with in a traditional diplomatic setting.

"Our enemies are not interested in sitting down and discussing. But more importantly, our enemies do not play fair. They attack innocent civilians in a way that we cannot understand. They are willing to die as long as they kill as many free thinkers as possible. They are willing to die in order to kill us," Alon said.

"This evening, we remember the four victims at the kosher market in Paris, but we must also remember that evil always exists. We are commanded to remember, not for the sake of the past, but for the sake of the future."

Jean-Francois Casabonne Masonnave, the French consul general in Toronto; Len Rudner, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' community relations director; CJMT president Simon Keslassy; and Rabbi Messod Azoulay, Abir Yaacov Congregation's spiritual leader, also said a few words about the terror attack before the gathering observed a moment of silence to honour the victims. ■

Bronfman firm and Caisse to invest in Israel

Stephen Bronfman

CJN STAFF, MONTREAL

The Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec, the province's public pension plan manager, and Claridge Inc., the private investment firm headed by Stephen Bronfman, are joining forces to take advantage of business opportunities in Israel's thriving civil technology and innovation sectors.

They have launched Claridge CDPQ Israel, a new investment firm based in Tel Aviv, it was announced on Feb. 11.

It's part of the Caisse's strategy to establish a presence in high-growth countries with partners who have an in-depth knowledge of the market, said Andreas Beroutsos, the Caisse's executive vice-president of private equity and infrastructure.

"Our participation in Claridge CDPQ Israel gives the Caisse access to a globally recognized hub of innovation," he said. "Such an environment will offer higher returns, greatly benefiting our depositors."

As of June 2014, the Caisse's net assets totalled $214.7 billion, according to its public information, making it one of the largest institutional fund managers in North America.

The new venture will also give Quebec companies greater access to Israel's technology industry, Beroutsos added.

Claridge president and CEO Pierre Boivin said: "We are putting in place the necessary infrastructure and capital to develop investment opportunities in technology companies with high growth potential that have succeeded in reaching the marketing stage. The partnership with the Caisse fits perfectly in our common strategic and patient investment philosophy."

Claridge CDPQ Israel will be headed by Oded Tal, an Israeli who previously held the position of chief investment officer at Claridge in Montreal from 2000 to 2008. Until recently, Tal served as managing director and head of mergers and acquisitions for Leumi Partners, the investment banking arm of the Leumi banking group.

"We are confident that the partnership between Claridge and the Caisse, combined with Mr. Tal's expertise, will add to the significant business experience and sustained community investment of the Bronfman family in Israel," said Stephen Bronfman, executive chairman of the company's board of directors.

Founded in 1987 by Charles Bronfman, Claridge manages a diverse portfolio that includes food, entertainment, real estate, energy and technology industries. ■

Guelph shul's project helps fulfil the mitzvot of Purim

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Over the past six years, Techiya Fisher's initiative to bring the mitzvot associated with Purim to Guelph's Jewish community has continued to gain momentum.

In her role as the wife of Rabbi Avraham Fisher, the spiritual leader of Guelph's Beth Isaiah Congregation, and the program and events co-ordinator at the shul, Fisher organizes a mishloach manot fundraiser to fulfil the mitzvot of Purim and bring the Jewish community together.

Fisher explained that although the congregation has a membership of about 40 families, there are only about 20 men and women who come to shul regularly.

"But on Purim, this is the time for each one to remember their friends, and send them baskets, even though they may not see them on a regular basis," she said.

Participants in the mishloach manot fundraiser pay $36 for one basket or $30 for two or more, and send Fisher a list of their friends and family they'd like to send a basket to in Guelph, Fergus and Elora, Ont.

"The baskets are filled with chocolate, hamantashen, grape juice, candies, whatever I find," she said.

"Every recipient receives a single mishloach manot [package] with a card listing the members who sent the basket to that recipient. No matter how many well-wishers you have, you will get one basket. Since the number of the baskets remains the same, the more people who participate in this mitzvah, the more money will be left for Beth Isaiah Congregation," Fisher wrote in a letter to the congregation.

But Fisher explained that this initiative is about more than sending gift baskets to one another. It is an opportunity to fulfill the mitzvot of Purim, which many people don't know about.

"The main mitzvot of Purim are not really known to many people... They only know about hamantashen and masks," she said.

In addition to sending mishloach manot to friends and family, observers of the holiday are meant to give matanot l'evyonim, gifts for the poor.

"On Purim, we also give charity to at least two poor people, or friends. We reach out to each other, so that no one should miss the joy of the occasion. Concern for the needy is a year-round responsibility. But on Purim, it's a special mitzvah to remember the poor," Fisher said.

Mishloach manot packages, ready for delivery

Although this is a fundraiser for the synagogue, 10 per cent of the money raised will be donated to an Israeli organization called Paamonim.

Paamonim aims to provide needy families with long-term, comprehensive solutions to debt and poverty. The organization offers guidance and support to those who are unable to solve their financial problems on their own.

Fisher said that since she started this fundraiser in 2009, it has grown.

"Six years ago, we started with about 30 baskets because they didn't know what it is. People who have received them, even if they are not members, they contact me and ask me to send baskets to their friends. So last year, we made 87 baskets, which, for a small community like ours, is very nice," she said, adding that last year, she raised $2,000, but expects to raise "much more than that" this year.

"This helps bring the community together. It is a very important aspect of this project. It's not just about the money and the goodies and the mitzvah. It's about building the community." ■

JDL pushes ahead with plans to expand into Montreal

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

The hard line Jewish Defence League Canada's (JDL) latest attempt to establish a Montreal chapter is being deplored by Rabbi Reuben Poupko, who heads the Jewish community's security co-ordinating committee.

He said law-enforcement agencies are doing a commendable job protecting the community and there is no need for the JDL or any other purported self-defence group to take on that role.

Toronto-based JDL Canada was to have held a meeting the evening of Feb. 16 at Ruby Foo's Hotel to explain why it is expanding into this city. It says Montreal had become "a focal point for radical Islamic ideology" and that it intends to join with other "anti-jihadist forces in Quebec" to "shut down" institutions that promote that ideology.

"The threat of violence towards Jews is increasing at an alarming rate, but the authorities seem to have limited ability to deal with these outrageous examples of civil disobedience," the widely circulated invitation to the meeting reads.

"These events take place because Jew-bashing has become an accepted form of racism and the sad reality is that many Jews refuse to understand the principle that a bully needs to be confronted to be defeated."

It faults "leaders of major Jewish organizations" for not gathering the community to respond as one voice.

JDL Canada says its priority in Montreal is to set up a "quick response security team to ensure that people who promote this type of Jew-hatred will face serious consequences from within the local community."

However, the flyer also states that its self-defence activities are "according to the laws of the country" and that JDL Canada works with police and other security departments.

Rabbi Poupko, who is also a board member of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said the Montreal police and RCMP have "rigorously investigated" major hate crimes against the Jewish community, which has led to convictions.

He said the community has confidence in the professionalism of the police and is grateful for the seriousness with which they treat any act or threat.

"There is no void here that needs to be filled," he said.

As for whether Montreal is a hub for extremism, Rabbi Poupko said, "Radical Islam is a worldwide phenomenon and, of course, in Montreal, as elsewhere in the West, it is a problem. But fear-mongering is not helpful.

"Anyone who knows the real situation on the ground feels confident about the Montreal Jewish community's security."

Last summer, during the conflict between Israel and Hamas in Gaza, JDL Canada director Meir Weinstein told the media he was about to open a Montreal chapter. A meeting was held in August at an unpublicized location, which was attended by about 50 people.

The JDL historically had its followers in Montreal, even into the 1990s. A memorial was held for JDL founder Meir Kahane at a synagogue here, which was attended by several prominent rabbis, after he was murdered in 1990.

In the United States, the FBI labelled the JDL a terrorist group in 2001. It has been inactive there for several years. ■

Older workers seek to re-invent themselves

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

More and more people who would formerly have been thinking of retirement are seeking employment and upgrading their skills today as a result of cutbacks, changes in legislation and financial needs.

"In this age of contract work, the days of working for one company the whole of one's adult working life are becoming rare," says Charlotte Koven, who worked at Temple Sinai religious and Hebrew school in Toronto for 27 years, 15 years as the principal.

Koven, who is in her early 60s, told The CJN that when the number of students dropped, she found herself in the position of having to re-invent herself when she was nearly of retirement age.

She is not alone. "Older or mature workers are increasingly becoming a large part of the clientele of JVS," says Lorie Shekter-Wolfson, president and CEO of JVS Toronto. "Last year, more than a third of those served by JVS were over the age of 45."

Shekter-Wolfson notes that there is an increase in older job seekers for financial security reasons. In the past five years, Canada has done away with a mandatory retirement age. As well, many organizations are finding that employees are staying longer.

"Many businesses and organizations no longer give employees the opportunity to participate in defined benefit pension plans that would give the retiree a monthly income until the person dies.

"Overall, the issue of older workers is now starting to get some notice and is a phenomenon that is here to stay. It is an area we all know too well."

JVS is starting to focus on employment opportunities for this population, she says. She adds that there is also an increase in the number of older workers applying for upgrading, as new skill sets are required.

Koven is a case in point. "It took courage for me to start over again," she said.

She began doing research online, participated in discussion groups and researched activities through online platforms.

With the help of her family, she enrolled in online graduate studies. Six months ago, she received a master's degree in counselling psychology with advanced training in bereavement, trauma and various losses.

"Transitioning successfully throughout the stages of one's life is a skill we must all be prepared to embrace. My own experiences have taught me how to respect and support others who are learning to navigate through life's challenges," Koven said.

Charlotte Koven

She has established a private counseling practice and she facilitates support groups and leads workshops. As well, she volunteers for the Bereaved Families of Ontario and at Princess Margaret Hospital.

Sometimes experience doesn't seem to matter when cutbacks are made. Steven Cohen, who is in his early 60s, is married with one child. He was a software programmer for one of the largest car parts makers in the world for six years.

He was let go, and the company said it was because of lack of work, he said.

Cohen told The CJN he believes that "they wanted to get rid of people. Today, companies outsource their work and then they don't have to pay benefits and [they] cut costs."

Cohen went to job fairs and searched for any employment, but couldn't find anything in his field.

"We had to sell our condo and now we are renting."

After more than a year, with the assistance of JVS, Cohen was sent on an unpaid apprenticeship for a month.

"I got the job and I am getting paid just above minimum wage, one-third of what I was paid at my last job. I would like to find something that would pay me a reasonable salary, but so far I have not found anything.

"It is very demeaning, after 37 years of IT experience, to be doing an IT job and starting at the very bottom. It is emotionally devastating," he said. ■

Limmud presenter to speak of serving in IDF

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Benji Aziza

Limmud is returning to Winnipeg on the weekend of March 14-15 for a fifth year with another outstanding group of speakers.

One of the more compelling presenters will be Winnipegger Benji Aziza. As a member of the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) from 2011 to 2013, Aziza spent three days working at an IDF field hospital on the Syrian border.

"We saw about 20 patients while I was there," he recalled. "Some came directly from the fighting in Syria. Others had been treated first at an Israeli hospital.

"It was a real tense time for me. It took a while for me to feel comfortable with the Syrians."

He recalled one teenage girl whose house was hit by a tank shell. She lost one leg and had experienced nine surgeries on the other at an Israeli hospital. She and her mother were going back to their village to see if any other family members survived.

He said there was constant mortar fire while he was at the hospital and remembers helping to carry wounded Syrians to bomb shelters. "We could watch the fighting from where we were," he recalls. "We were just 25 miles from Damascus."

He added: "Treating the Syrian wounded is a huge financial burden for Israel. Most people aren't aware of this ongoing humanitarian effort. But Israel has a long history of offering humanitarian help."

Aziza admitted he didn't pay much attention to the Syrian conflict before his brief posting at the field hospital. Since then, he's been reading everything he can about it. "It's genocide," he said. "The worst in the last decade. And most of the world just sits back and watches."

Aziza was born in Toronto and grew up in Winnipeg. In 2008, his family decided to move to Israel. The then-15-year-old wasn't very happy with the move at first. He'd been attending a public high school and felt no special attachment to Israel. But he adjusted quickly, and when his family moved back to Winnipeg in 2012, he stayed on. By that time, he was already in the IDF.

Before entering the army, Aziza spent eight months working with Magen David Adom. In the army, he took a commander's course and rose to the rank of staff sergeant. During the operation against Hamas in Gaza in 2012, one of Aziza's duties was to provide first-aid training to combat soldiers waiting for the signal to enter Gaza. (The war ended without a major Israeli ground incursion.)

He also was part of several IDF teams that went into Jenin from time to time in search of wanted individuals or suspicious people.

"It is one thing to be Jewish here and say you support Israel," he said. "But I was able to see both sides while living in Israel."

His best friend in Israel was an Israeli Arab fellow student. "We would go to Jaffa on Saturday afternoons, drink coffee and play backgammon. I was invited to his house for Ramadan," Aziza said.

"A strong majority of both Jews and Arabs in Israel just want to co-exist in peace," he said. "My father's friend was quite clear that he doesn't want to live under a Palestinian Authority government."

While Aziza will no doubt return to Israel one day, he spoke of the need to take a breather to digest what he experienced. He is currently taking classes at the University of Manitoba and is thinking about a career in law.

Among the other presenters at this year's Limmud are Rabbi Sid Schwartz from Maryland and Rabbi Zvi Hirschfield from Israel; brothers and former Winnipeggers Benjamin Shinewald, a former CEO of the Canadian Jewish Congress, and Jeremy Shinewald, a former speechwriter for Israel's ambassador to the United States; Ira Robinson, chair of Canadian Jewish Studies in the department of religion and director of the Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies at Concordia University; and former Winnipeggers and current Vancouverites, author Barry Shell and Limmud Vancouver chair Avi Dolgin.

Limmud is a grassroots movement that started in London 30 years ago to foster Jewish learning. In the last 15 years, it has spread all over the world. Last year, some 250 people attended Limmud Winnipeg, and organizers hope to match or exceed that turnout this year. ■

Chabad has 'helped me find home'

Amy Grief

I had been living on campus at the University of Limerick in Ireland for just under a month a couple of years ago, and I got an email from Rabbi Moishy Goldman, who runs the Chabad centre in Waterloo, Ont. From 5,000 kilometres away, the rabbi urged me to "schlep" to Dublin to celebrate Purim. He helped me reach out to the rabbi there, and ensured I would have a raucous party to commemorate the holiday.

Later, backpacking through western Europe in the first half of 2013, I visited two more international Chabad houses, largely because of Moishy's encouragement. I joined an 800-person seder in Barcelona and had an intimate Shabbat dinner in Munich.

Moishy and his wife, Rivky, moved to Waterloo from Crown Heights, Brooklyn, the epicentre of the Chabad-Lubavitch movement, in December 2008. Rabbi Goldman believes his was the first Chabad house to open after the horrific attack in Mumbai, which left six dead, including Chabad Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and his wife, Rivka.

"I always saw ourselves as representing the response to terror in that you're never going to get us to close up shop and go away," Moishy says.

In their first year in Waterloo, Rivky remembers being thrilled when 28 students joined them for Shabbat dinner. "That was like, whoa, I'm not going to remember everyone's names," she says. Now, it's not unusual if 70 students show up to their home on Albert Street, adjacent to the Wilfrid Laurier University campus.

On Jan. 9, they held Shabbat 180, billed as Waterloo's biggest Shabbat dinner ever. The presidents of both Laurier and the University of Waterloo attended, along with a crowd of almost 200 students. "It's an incredible feeling of pride and unity and strength, and especially in these times, that's what we need," Rivky says.

Throughout my time in Waterloo, I watched the Goldmans' Shabbat dinners grow. But the sense of intimacy – and heaping plates of homemade food – never changed.

Though Moishy is happy with the increased attendance, those aren't the metrics that are most important to him. "I feel more fulfilled, and I feel like I'm doing something useful and meaningful and making a difference when I'm sitting in my office at Laurier talking to two students for an hour and a half," he says.

Moishy has also formed a unique bond with members of the Jewish fraternity AEPi, where they initiated him into the fraternity as Brother Challah. He supports the brothers and hosts kosher dinners for them once or twice each semester.

"It's really a great icebreaker when I can tell a first-year student who is all excited about frat life, and getting drunk with his friends and partying and all that, and say, 'You know, by the way, I'm a frat brother,'" he says. Moishy explains that this helps shatter the stereotype of rabbis being boring and stale.

Rivky usually holds classes for young women, but she took a hiatus last semester because she had a baby – her fourth – in October. Though she presents a traditional ideology regarding a woman's role in Jewish life, her classes have allowed me to reflect upon my own values and enable me to continue developing a unique Jewish identity for myself.

On Jan. 22, the Goldmans held a reunion for alumni living in Toronto. More than 40 people crowded into a condo party room in the north end of the city. As I wandered around schmoozing, I realized my memories of Chabad Waterloo were swathed in a glowing, yellow light. The Yiddish word "heimish" – cozy and familiar – came to mind.

Growing up in Thornhill, I was ensconced in the proverbial Jewish bubble. But when I moved to Waterloo to attend Laurier, and later when I travelled abroad, I had to determine how to express my own Jewish identity. The Goldmans always helped me find home. ■

Amy Grief is currently completing the master of journalism program at Ryerson University in Toronto.

Custom-designed kippahs a specialty at The Israeli Source

Imagine being able to custom-design kippahs for your wedding guests – having something that is your very own creation, different from any made for any wedding ever before.

Previously a dream only available to those willing to shell out untold amounts of cash, Thornhill's Judaica superstore, The Israeli Source, now offers exactly that option to any couple looking to make their special day that much more special.

The simchah experts at The Israeli Source are able to help clients choose from a breathtaking array of an absolutely staggering 400-million-plus kippah customization options, before even taking into account completely custom-designed hand-crocheted kippah patterns, so that each couple can have something that truly reflects their own sense of style.

"The idea is," explains Chuck Elnekave, who has for the last 14 years been helping customers by guiding them through the ordering process, "to give each wedding, each bar or bat mitzvah, the ability to be unique in its style, down to something as formerly run of the mill as the kippahs. There's no reason that kippahs can't be as much of a custom creation as the catering menu or the floral arrangements.

"Styles and fads change every season, and we strive to stay on top of those trends, giving our clients the ability to get what's hot. Last year's favoured choices of suede kippahs for weddings and satin kippahs for bar mitzvahs give way to this year's popularity of linen kippahs for weddings and sports mesh kippahs for bar mitzvahs. Next year's contemporary choice will be different still – and so we ensure to position ourselves to be ready for whatever comes."

But does that mean that they're ready to rest? In Elnekave's words – no. "In the last year, we've managed to increase the range of options to our customers twofold. And we're constantly in search of new possibilities that will maximize our clients' ability to have it their way. New developments are always underway, and it's always a great feeling for us to see the customers' reactions when they see how much fun they can have putting together their own unique creation."

But kippahs aren't all – Elnekave says that The Israeli Source is always adding new artists to its repertoire of gallery-quality ketubahs. Popular artists such as Danny Azoulay, Mickie Caspi, and Emanuel Bensolomon are counted amongst the many who The Israeli Source work with to ensure that every couple can have a beautiful ketubah to enhance their wedding, a cherished souvenir to constantly remind them of that special day.

Offering a variety of artists, explains Elnekave, ensures that clients will have many options not only in design but also in personalization options and price.

"Some artists," he says, "create limited-edition prints of their work. It's all pre-done, so while you're getting something that is guaranteed to be a limited quantity run and not something mass produced, you also might sacrifice the ability to personalize to the degree you might like. Other artists print separately for each order and employ digital calligraphy methods, so in those cases a couple can customize their ketubah a bit more. Each options has its pros and its cons – we try to work with our clients to find something that suits them."

If that wasn't enough, The Israeli Source also offers an impressive selection of benschers. After finding a benscher that suits their tastes, explains Elnekave, the couple can even add finishing touches such as a custom monogram embossed on the front cover. "We try to make it a one-stop simchah shopping experience," says Elnekave. And what an experience it is.

The Israeli Source is at 60 Doncaster Ave., Thornhill. Call 905-482-2025. ■

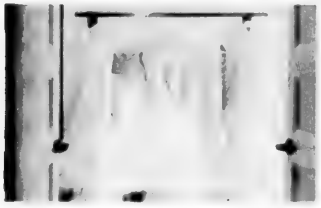
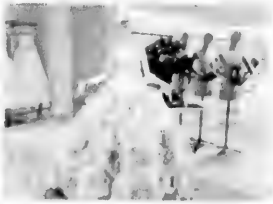
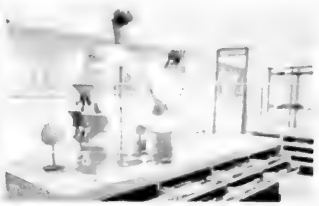
Kleinfeld Hudson's Bay, where your bridal journey begins







An unforgettable salon experience. That's what you can expect at your initial gown consultation.

ARRIVING AT THE SALON

First, you'll visit the Kleinfeld Hudson's Bay reception desk on the seventh floor. Your consultant will greet you and take a few minutes to get to know you and the three family members and friends you brought along.

DISCUSSING YOUR DREAM DRESS

You'll have a quick chat about what you're looking for and you're welcome to explore the gowns out on the floor. If you've been saving dresses to your Hudson's Bay Wish List online or collecting clippings of your favourite gowns, this is the perfect time to show them to your consultant.

SEARCHING OUR ASSORTMENT

While you put on your luxurious robe in one of our fitting rooms, your consultant will search the salon for all the gowns that match your description of the perfect dress – and maybe even ones that don't. Allow your consultant to make recommendations. You could end up falling in love with a dress you would have never considered.

TRYING ON GOWNS

If you don't already have the shoes and lingerie you'll be wearing on your big day, we can provide those to you during your appointment. With the help of your consultant, you'll try on all the gowns that you believe will be strong contenders. And we can't forget about the Twirling Area. That's where you'll get the chance to see each gown in the spotlight and show it off to your family and friends.

FINDING THE ONE

With our extensive, specially curated selection of designer bridal gowns, don't be surprised if you find "the dress" on your first visit to Kleinfeld Hudson's Bay. It's always an emotional and celebratory moment when you say "I do" to the dress of your dreams. But the excitement doesn't stop there.

COMPLETING YOUR LOOK

You'll also have the opportunity to browse through our beautiful assortment of shoes and accessories. You can even try on your favourites with your gown to get the full picture of your overall wedding day look.

WHAT HAPPENS NEXT?

We will contact you when your dress has arrived at the salon to schedule your first fitting. Remember, it can take up to three fittings to ensure your gown is the absolute perfect fit.

We also have a stunning selection of bridesmaid dresses and we would love to help you and your bridesmaids find theirs during another shopping experience you'll never forget. ■

Childhood friendship blooms into romance

VICKY TOBIANAH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It's not often that a couple can say that they grew up with their spouse, but Debra Vatenmakher and Jacob Posluns can.

They both attended Netivot HaTorah Day School throughout elementary school. In Grade 7, they became close friends and by Grade 9 they were dating and have been together ever since. This past summer they got engaged and are planning a June 2015 wedding.

Vatenmakher and Posluns, now both 20, can say they truly know their spouse better than anyone.

"We were in school together but weren't so close until Grade 7," said Vatenmakher. "He claims he had a crush on me in Grade 4, though."

After becoming best friends, they quickly realized they had feelings for one another and started dating. "I think something that's really special about our relationship is we've grown up together. We know each other better than anyone else in the world," said Vatenmakher.

They had been dating for six years when

Jacob Posluns and Debra Vatenmakher met at Netivot HaTorah Day School.

Posluns proposed. "We have been talking about getting married since we were 14, but no one would have taken us seriously at that age. Only over the past two years did we discuss publicly about wanting to get married," said Posluns.

"Once I got the okay from her parents, I began planning the proposal. With my cousin's help, we set up roses and candles along a dock by the lake.

"When approaching the dock and getting ready to propose, a few things went wrong. It happened to be pretty windy along the water so by the time we got there, almost all of the roses had fallen into the water and all of the candles had blown out. Luckily, Debra says she does not remember any of it and she could not have been happier with how everything went," he said.

Although they're not in school together anymore – Vatenmakher is at York University studying kinesiology while Posluns is studying business technology management at Ryerson University – they're still best friends who put each other first.

"I'm really excited for just the mundane things like being able to sit on the couch while he's sitting at the table doing his homework and finally being together every day," she said.

"I hang out with him all the time and I always have to go home at the end of the night. I find it's so hard. I'm definitely looking forward to going home with him, and I'm looking forward to eventually building a family together," she said.

The couple is planning a traditional Orthodox wedding in June and has advice for any other couples dealing with the stress of planning a wedding.

"I think it's really important not to let the wedding get to you and to always stay focused on the reason for the whole adventure of planning a wedding – which is to marry the person you love and start a life together, and I think that that's the best advice," said Vatenmakher.

"Always keep your eye on the prize, know why you're doing it and the rest doesn't matter." ■

Jacob planned a romantic proposal for Debra.

Consultant helps make your special day perfect

How exciting! You are getting married.

After the kvelling and misty eyes, the planning starts, and this is where things can quickly go from dream to nightmare.

The first thing that has to be decided is the budget. This can be tricky because unless budget is no issue, money can be difficult to talk about.

The groom will have already spent a good chunk of change on the ring, which is, in his mind, justifiable, since the bride will have it forever.

A wedding is over in a day and the dress is worn but once...all true. However the wedding is the start of everything that an engagement ring represents and it will, in fact, also be with the couple forever.

The very word "wedding" means the act of blending or joining contrasting elements. A wedding is the celebration of the uniting of two families, through the bride and groom. While the wedding day is focused on the bride and groom, it is, by definition, a family event.

So how does one make everyone in both families happy?

How many times have you seen a bride-to-be and her mother, father or future in-laws all having meltdowns over something or other related to the pending nuptials? It always happens if you are doing things yourself. Invariably, someone feels that they are doing too much while someone else feels that they are not doing enough.

That's where a wedding planner steps in.

A wedding planner is an expert in his/her field. You wouldn't draft your own legal agreement or fill your own tooth, so why would you plan one of the most important days in your life on your own?

A great wedding planner is on everyone's team but nobody's side.

Your bridal consultant takes the stress of every detail and logistic away from the bride and her family and seamlessly stitches everything together so that the perfect day unfolds as everyone dreamed it would.

Your bridal consultant has at her fingertips vendors, caterers, florists, make-up artists, musicians, ice sculptors, aerial performers, klezmer bands, cake artists, paper specialists, horse and carriage drivers and even white-gloved footmen – anyone and everything to make your day perfect.

A great bridal consultant is able to make even a modest budget look generous. Although you might consider the consulting fee something that you could have allocated elsewhere, your consultant will be able to secure much better deals than you would have on your own. This means you will probably save more with a planner on your team, than going solo, despite the consulting fee.

The most critical part of hiring a wedding planner, is hiring someone that you like and with whom you have an instant connection. You are going to be working very closely with your consultant so hire someone that your gut tells you is the right fit.

Once the last of the champagne has been sipped and you finally take a breath and look back on your wedding day you should sigh because it was perfect, not because you are relieved it's over.

Looking for the Best Bachleorette/Bachelor places in Toronto? The CJN has compiled a partial list:

Body Blitz

If you can't afford a bachelorette party in Miami or Tel Aviv, head to this women's only spa to escape Toronto's harsh winters. Besides offering a full menu of massages, scrubs, facials and mud, its main attraction is a water circuit. Jump in and out of pools to get your blood flowing. They have a hot one with Epsom salt, a warm one with Dead Sea salt and a cold plunge, that may actually be refreshing. You and your girlfriends can lounge around all day and detox all the toxins you accumulated from a rager the night before. They accept group bookings. 416-364-0400

Drake Hotel

This decade-old mainstay in Toronto's west end can provide services for your entire bachelorette or bachelor antics, from dinner, to dancing, to crashing in a room upstairs to a gossipy brunch the morning after. Choose between bottle service or ordering off their extensive cocktail list. They offer a prix-fixe menu for large groups. 416-531-5042

Flirty Girl Fitness

Why hire a stripper for your bachelorette when you can learn the skills yourself? This King West studio has various sexy dance options, from belly dancing to lap dancing to a chair striptease. They provide all the props like feather boas, cowboy hats, mocktinis and a Coyote-Ugly style bar for you to show off your moves. They also have options for girly add-ons like manicures and pedicures. 416-920-1400

Rock'n' Horse Saloon

A mechanical bull – need we say more? See how long the bride or groom can last without getting thrown off. When that inevitably happens, and it will – probably in one minute or less, you will have the chance to show off the line-dancing skills you learned during your bar mitzvah years and get down to Cotton 'Eye Joe. For pre-party eats, they have a pub-style menu. Don't forget your plaids. 647-344-1234

Crew and Tangos

Watch some of Toronto's finest drag-queen talent at this bar in the Church-Wellesley Village. Sure to be a good time for guys and gals, an added bonus is the groom probably won't have to worry about another guy coming on to his girl. Full of energy and dance moves, these performers are sure to make it a night to remember. 647-349-7469

High Tea at the Windsor Arms Hotel

Rise above the drunken fray and have a bachelorette party your mother-in-law won't blush at attending. Sip from their collection of loose-leaf teas and munch on scones and crustless cucumber sandwiches. A gluten-free menu is available. Afternoon tea is served at this Yorkville hotel four times a day and starts at $38 a person. Kate Middleton who? 416-971-9666

Pravda

This Russian-themed vodka bar on Wellington caters to an older, more refined crowd. Over 70 vodkas are available and you can do shots from glasses made from ice. They're prepared for large bookings and can provide private space, vodka tastings to educate your guests and live instrumentalists. They also offer dinner, bottle service and caviar tastings. Spend a night being treated like a czar. 416-366-0303

Elmwood Spa

This 30-year-old spa at Yonge and Dundas has enough room to host a big bachelorette party and a has second boutique location in the Church-Wellesley Village for more intimate events. Spend all day lounging around in comfy robes and gossiping with your girlfriends. Sweat out any nerves about the big day in the steam room or sauna and pamper yourself with their extensive menu of spa services. Order lunch from their menu or from the attached Bangkok Garden restaurant. 416-977-6751 ■

The pre-wedding jitters

STEPHEN SWEET
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I was moments away from one of the biggest events of my life.

And yet, I wasn't nervous. I wasn't excited. I wasn't really feeling much of anything.

It had been that way for practically the entire 24 hours before my wedding.

I had planned to play in my baseball game the night before my wife, Cassie, and I were to get married, which I figured would be a natural distraction to keep me from getting anxious about my wedding day. But the game got rained out, which seemed like it would give me way too much time to over-think and worry about things, which is what I usually do in those situations.

I didn't do either, though. I went through my normal routine as though the next day wasn't going to be the biggest day of my life, and that was how I felt.

That's all right, I figured. I would feel it in the morning for sure.

I woke up at 7:45 a.m. on my wedding day and my heart started racing briefly. Surely now I would be excited for the moment just hours away.

But I calmed down, slept for another hour or so, and when I woke up the next time, I was unruffled once again.

I did what I had planned to do that day, figuring that something would trigger it. Would it be when I prayed? When I got dressed? When we reached the hall?

Something had to be wrong.

I grabbed everything I needed to bring in from the car and went into the banquet hall, still a good 90 minutes before the tish and kabalat panim were set to start.

Some of Cassie's and my friends were keeping an eye on us to make sure that our paths didn't cross, as [we followed tradition] and we weren't seeing each other for a week before our wedding.

I went in and did pictures with my half of the family, occasionally popping out into the main foyer, which had a mechitzah (divider) down the middle to keep our sides separate.

At that point, Cassie's friend let me know that I was being too loud (which is something I've only heard about 20 times or so since getting married) and it was making Cassie miss me.

I got a small flare of adrenaline. Finally, a bit of something.

But it wouldn't last, and even when the tish and kabalat panim began, and family and friends began to stream in, it still didn't hit me that I would be married in about an hour. I still wasn't feeling it.

Finally, the rabbi called me over and asked if I was ready. I began to have some nerves and feel that rush. The music began and I was led over to the other side of the divider to see my kallah.

The magnitude of the moment hit me, and I just couldn't wait to see her. I'd missed her for a week and I was seconds away from getting to be around Cassie.

She was sitting there with a smile on her face. In that moment, she was the most beautiful person I had ever seen.

The rabbi spoke and explained the significance of a few things that were happening, but he had told me beforehand that while he was doing that, I was just to take the moment and gaze upon my kallah, and I was more than happy to oblige.

I hadn't felt the nerves for the upcoming wedding, or excitement, or anything really, before those moments.

It was because without the woman that I wanted to spend the rest of my life with, none of it seemed real.

Once I saw her, I knew it was real. It was right. ■

Travel bug leads to nuptials

GILLIAN HESS
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I get restless when I sense complacency. I was 21 years old and it took a seven-week European trip to help me genuinely understand how much more there was to experience outside of the world I knew. I thought then, I had cured this itchy feeling to leave but found myself constantly searching for reasons to travel. Without this itch prior to graduating university, I wouldn't have met the man I married four months ago.

After a 15-hour flight I was dreading another four-hour bus ride from Incheon airport to Gwangju, a city 250 miles south of Seoul where I was heading back to teach. Just like last year I imagined the tedious bus ride to be full of Korean nationals and me, being the solo foreigner, which meant a bus ride of more playlists on repeat.

As I was dragging my luggage to the bus, I felt a light tap on my shoulder that prompted me to remove my headphones and see who required my attention. At the other end of the friendly tap was a tall, masculine, slim, young Brit, who kindly offered to place my suitcases in the bottom storage compartment of the bus. As we were the only two non-Koreans about to board, we decided to sit together and chat about what brought us to the South.

Four hours of conversation felt like four minutes of getting to know each other and we had only just touched on our university years in both England and Canada before the bus pulled up to the terminal.

We soon came to realize how much we actually had in common. We were both raised in non-traditional Jewish households, had bar/bat mitzvahs, admitted our love for forbidden, un-kosher foods and were passionate about travelling. We both seemed be in the same stage of our lives – single, holding university degrees with no real, tangible plan.

I had dated Jewish guys in the past but thought the last place on Earth I'd find a Jewish boyfriend would be South Korea. So did my parents who were probably a bit more worried about it than I was.

It was March 2, 2011 when I met my future husband, and together we enjoyed a year of travelling Korea, visiting Taiwan for New Year's and experiencing a new set of norms and culture as a couple.

After our year was up we decided to move to England so Adam could complete his teaching qualification while I found a job at an international IT company. As a Canadian, I was granted a two- year working visa, and we made the best out of the time we had on this small, overpopulated island.

In October 2013 we decided to travel to Iceland for one week. It was winter, I was missing the snow and Adam was craving an adventure. We rented a car in Reykjavik and drove up the east coast, passing massive waterfalls, frozen lagoons and spotting about five vehicles in five hours.

The breathtaking landscape, snow-capped volcanos and bubbling geysers made for a visual explosion of beauty and remoteness. Selfishly, it felt like we had the world to ourselves.

On our last day Adam planned a short sunset hike up a mountain just behind our hotel. We're both not big trekkers but thought the view would be too wonderful to pass up. After about 90 minutes, we arrived at the top of the foothill as the sky turned lovely shades of pastels. Just as I gently collapsed on the peak trying to absorb this breathtaking view, the sight in front of me became even more unbelievable. Adam was kneeling down, holding out a glistening diamond ring, shining as bright as the setting sun. Life, at that moment, was beautiful.

When you decide to move away, turning life into a journey filled with uncertainty then it's the unexpected which enables you to learn, adapt and grow. Lots of people have told me how brave I am – that they too would move abroad if they weren't so scared. Of course I was scared, but I now know that courage makes up only about 15 per cent of life-changing decisions. The other 85 per cent is simply about wanting it with all your heart. In my case it was my fear of complacency, the sure knowledge in my head that there was more to this world than my small circle that drove me forward. I'm so glad I followed both my heart and my head. ■

Honeymoon adventure in South America

GILLIAN HESS
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Growing up in Thornhill one might understand why moving to South Korea for two years might challenge almost everything I knew as familiar. But they say everything happens for a reason and if I hadn't decided to pack my bags after I graduated university, I wouldn't have met my husband, Adam.

It's still bizarre using the "H" word since our wedding was only four months ago, and it's even stranger using my new last name at the office but all of these things will soon become mundane, I'm sure. My life on the other hand, has been anything but.

Adam and I are avid travellers, which is one of the many commonalities we share. We met teaching English in South Korea, moved to England together (Adam's birthplace) for two years, became engaged in Iceland and got married in Toronto. Our wedding was Sept. 21, 2014, and shortly after we left on an epic three-month backpacking trip/extended honeymoon all around South America.

Our first stop was the beach in Montanita, Ecuador. We decided to stay in a "pricier" hotel to relax and finally enjoy each other's company after all the wedding dramas and entertaining of family and friends. Being escorted to our first bungalow by a friendly Ecuadorian man, I remember him describing our room's amenities and explaining how lucky we are since we got the last big suite with a balcony. "It even comes with hot water," he proclaimed.

My initial North American mind set was a bit confused thinking, 'Well obviously it comes with hot water – how else would we be able to shower?' My expectations of this trip suddenly dropped. Not necessarily in a bad way but in a way that would help me better appreciate this beautiful continent and all it had to offer... even if that didn't include hot water!

After Ecuador we made our way through Peru visiting smaller Inca ruins and villages, observing the locals in their traditional dress and touring around the Sacred Valley which eventually lead us to that legendary green mountain better known as, Machu Picchu. Adam and I aren't big hikers so we casually boarded the air conditioned train which took us as close to the mountain as possible before joining the 5:30 a.m. bus destined to the base of the peak. When we arrived at Machu Picchu, it was early and the fog hadn't yet evaporated. As the day went on and we climbed our way to the top, the clouds began to separate, revealing the most breathtaking, iconic image of vast, never ending green highlands, so grand and overwhelmingly captivating. It was magical.

We travelled mostly by buses down South America and really embraced each country, its food and culture. Bolivia though quite challenging was ultimately a fascinating country. Surrounded by the tranquil Lake Titicaca, this unique country exudes magnificence. The Salt Flats (Salar de Uyuni) were unlike anything I had ever seen – driving for days through flat desert salt grounds with an epic background of clear mirrored sky and endless white.

Chile was also a highlight for both Adam and I, touring around Valle Elquie- Pisco county, floating in a highly salted lagoon similar to the Dead Sea and exploring the colourful, artistic streets of Valpariso.

We took tango lessons in Argentina, tried zip lining and horseback riding in Ecuador, trekked to a canyon in Peru spotting 6-feet tall condors, sailed by humpback whales near the Galapagos, hitchhiked with strangers and even spent our last few days on a secluded beach in Uruguay with no electricity. From the snow-capped peaks of the Andes to the rippling Amazon, South America seemed to have it all. We ate shark, cow's heart and other foreign delicacies while also embracing our own background by joining a Shabbat dinner at the Chabad in La Paz.

Naturally, three months of travelling came with some highs and lows (literally, in La Paz we were elevated to as high as 4,100 meters above sea level). This honeymoon was really an adventure of a lifetime but it also tested us to the limit. We saw unimaginable poverty, we learned that toilet seats are not a necessity and both agree we will never take hot water for granted again. So thank you South America for showing us a chaotic and harsh reality but simultaneously throwing us into the heart of an amazing range of unexpected experiences, heavenly landscapes and a wealth of treasured history. ■

Wedding speeches and toasts documented for posterity

ELAINE COHEN
SUPPLEMENTS CO ORDINATOR

Wedding photographs and bridal toasts date back centuries and the toasting tradition is practiced throughout the world.

Today, however, no one has to dig through wedding scrapbooks or albums to track down toasters' goodwill wishes.

Words and gestures are not only recorded and stored on video and websites but every move can be retrieved on tablets, laptops, smart phones, and personal computers.

Caroline Tiger author of Wedding Speeches and Toasts and Other Words for Family and Friends, notes the history of the term "toasts" stems from the early decanting process, whereby scorched toast was placed at the bottom of the wine bottle to absorb sediment.

Toasts usually begin after cocktails, once everybody has been seated for the meal. Wedding speeches and toasts may be interspersed so that a few are reserved for the end of the dinner.

The best man often acts as master of ceremonies and the maid of honour may co-host. If the latter is the case, co-hosts should compare notes in advance to avoid repetition as well as to confirm the order of speakers.

Groom toasts bride.

The father or mother of the bride usually welcomes guests and thanks them for coming. Other family members or close friends follow. The bride and groom conclude the toasts. Every toast should end with compliments to the couple as well as l'chaim and best wishes.

Everyone appreciates a dash of humour, provided jokes and anecdotes are in good taste and refrain from embarrassing or hurting celebrants' feelings. Avoid private jokes or stories that allude to something familiar to only a select few.

When writing a speech or toast, start with a rough draft. Spill out what comes to mind and don't worry about grammar until the editing stage. Jog your memory with the following queries: How long have you known the bride and groom? How did you meet them? Do you have an inspirational or humorous story related to them? How are they similar? How do they differ? What are your wishes for their future?

Tiger offers numerous tips for writing a toast. Divide it into three parts: introduction, tribute and toast. As soon as you mount the podium take a deep breath, look around you, make eye contact with the guests and address the bride and groom. Introduce yourself to the guests by announcing your full name, and connection to the couple. Speak slowly and distinctly. To conclude, raise a glass and propose a toast.

If planning to read the speech, make sure the print is a decent point size and the type is double spaced. If you're not reading it, jot major points on an index card and memorize the first and last lines.

Anyone hesitant to give speech writing a try, should heed the advice of Angela Lansbury, author of Wedding Speeches and Toasts (Family Matters). "Don't worry too much about giving a [great] speech," she said. "This is a happy occasion and people aren't going to mind."

Tiger offers similar advice. "Don't try to style yourself into a modern day Shakespeare, just be natural but respectful."

Speechwriting shouldn't be left to the last minute. Mark Twain once quipped, "It takes three weeks to prepare a good impromptu speech."■

Leave the details to your wedding planner

The following wedding planners tell you how they can help make your simchah elegant and stress-free.

Heidi Gruenspan
A planner takes the worry away from the client. During the big day, a planner acts as the client's eyes and ears. We double-check floor plans, and ensure deliveries occur and end up where they're supposed to. In case of emergency, like illness or flood, we handle things.

Gayle Kertzman
We recommend suppliers tailored to your needs and budget, we ensure all the vendors are adhering to the timeline on the day of the event, and we deal with any issues that may arise from guests or suppliers. We allow you to be a guest at your own event.

Karen Garscadden
Where do I set up? When will the bar open? What should I do with gifts? How do I control the lights? Will my mother-in-law get her gluten-free dinner? What should I do, my kid lost his jacket button in the car!

Having an experienced event planner instills confidence and has an immediate calming effect. You seldom have to ask a question, as details have been well planned.

Judy Stein
Consultants are saviours on the night of the event in case anything at all should go wrong.

However, this is all in preparation that is done prior to the day. When planned well, there should be very few, if any, hitches that happen on that day. But if something should come up that is unexpected, consultants are there to handle the situation.

Tamara Temes
I help clients create a vision for their simchah. I look after every detail so that the client can enjoy their party. I recommend reputable vendors, organize a detailed event itinerary, attend meetings at the request of the client, and help with the overall budget for the event. I also act as an intermediary between all of the vendors on the day of the event.

The most important benefit of hiring a planner is that the client can sit back and enjoy a stress-free simchah.

Gloria Benaim
Consultants help in a multitude of ways, most especially on the actual day. Hosts need someone to keep the photography schedule moving along so it doesn't run late, someone to make sure the room looks exactly how the couple has imagined, and someone to liaise between the kitchen and the band so that food gets served hot. These are just a couple of things a consultant does on the day of your wedding – so many little details that need attending and little fires to be put out.

Patricia Wald
A good bridal consultant performs a crucial role. One can plan a wedding without a consultant, but when this happens, someone from the bridal party is left with the huge responsibility of making certain that the hairdresser, the makeup artist, the musicians, the florist, the caterer, etc. are all where they should be on the day of the wedding. In the event that something goes wrong, there is no one to call on. ■

Vienna's Lauder Business School looking for Canadians

plungen@thecjn.ca

Dovi Lipton figures if you're going to get a business school education, you might as well do it in the city voted the best place in the world in which to live, one that's close to other exotic locales, that offers a Jewish milieu, that possesses a vibrant civic life and that offers government-subsidized tuition costs to its students.

Hey, who wouldn't sign up for that?

Lipton, a 28-year-old Toronto native, had to go all the way to Vienna, Austria, for that sweet deal, and he's happy he did.

He's so happy, he's helping show Daniella Sheinfeld, the school's head of marketing, around Toronto to raise the school's profile among young people planning their post-secondary education.

The Lauder Business School (LBS) doesn't have much of a profile here in Toronto, Lipton acknowledged. In fact, he's only one of two Canadians enrolled out of 350 students from 43 countries. He probably would have been unaware of it himself if he didn't personally know a professor who took a job there 10 years ago.

The school was established by philanthropist and former American ambassador to Austria, Ronald Lauder.

The Lauder name is well known in Canada for cosmetics, but in Europe there are Jewish community buildings and organizations galore that are supported by the family foundation.

The Lauder Business School is one of these, and as Lipton and Sheinfeld make the rounds and deliver their pitch, they focus on the quality education students receive, the international flavour of the campus and its student body, its Jewish atmosphere, the proximity to other Euro travel destinations and the richness of studying in one of Europe's historic cultural capitals.

The campus itself is a reflection of that. Almost all the school's buildings were part of the summer palace of Empress Maria Theresa, and are in the baroque style (17th century), Sheinfeld said.

Lipton has spent the last year and a half at the school. "It's really different," he said. "You go over there, meet people, travel in Europe, learn other languages.

"People dream of doing the 'Eurotrip.' This is the Eurotrip on steroids."

Daniella Sheinfeld

Dovi Lipton

The school's language of instruction is English and the atmosphere is Jewish, with students living on campus enjoying three kosher meals a day, access to a synagogue, social gatherings, excursions, Jewishly oriented extracurricular activities and courses on Jewish topics.

The school's Jewish Learning Program provides subsidies toward room and board and is supported financially by the Jewish Heritage Fund, which is sponsored by private donors.

From an academic perspective, LBS offers graduate programs in international management and leadership, as well as banking, finance and compliance. Its bachelor's program offers a degree in international business administration.

Tuition fees are subsidized by the Austrian government and are modest by North American standards – 720 euros (about $850 US) per semester for international students, half that for Europeans.

Even with the flights back and forth, and out of pocket expenses, Lipton calculates that the cost is cheaper than getting a bachelor's degree while living away from home at an Ontario university.

LBS is the only Jewish university in the European zone," said Sheinfeld, who hails from Israel and studied there before taking the communications job.

"It combines a warm, supportive Jewish environment – it recognizes and celebrates Jewish holidays – and allows students to maintain and strengthen their Jewish identity," she said.

"I think it's an added value to come from the North American market to an international one. Business is global," she said, "and it's a one-time opportunity in life to gather experience and international culture." ■

Parents hope to raise funds to keep high school open

Tuition for the high school program for the coming year is about $14,000.

Andrea Freedman, president and CEO of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, said the challenge with the deficit is that it's ongoing.

"This is not a short-term infusion of cash that is required to save the school. It is an ongoing minimum deficit of $250,000 each and every year. So that means that for every incoming Grade 9 class, to see them through to graduation is $1 million. And there is no obvious source for these funds, despite peoples' good intentions," she said.

"It was a decision of the school board to close it, but it is a broader community decision to not provide additional deficit funding for the school."

Smith said the OJCS will begin to phase out the high school program next fall.

"We are committed to providing the existing Grade 10 and 11 classes with the ability to finish their high school studies and graduate from OJCS," he said.

The elementary school currently has a student body of about 200.

David Roytenberg, a father of one OJCS graduate and one current OJCS student, hopes he can galvanize Ottawa's Jewish community to raise the funds necessary to sustain the high school.

He started a Facebook group called "Supporters of the Ottawa Jewish Community High School," and has managed to raise more than $5,000 in just two days.

"We are trying to raise money to reverse the decision. But they've presented it as a fait accompli," Roytenberg said.

"Obviously we would have some work to do to increase the enrolment... There wasn't really a Grade 9 class this year, which was part of the problem. They had one kid come in this past fall, so that leaves a big hole in the school... But personally I just find it unthinkable that we would close the high school. It is like the cornerstone of the community," Roytenberg said.

He added that there are seven OJCS eighth graders who are signed up for Grade 9 next year, and their parents are now faced with a choice about where to send them.

Freedman said the decision to close the school is not one that anyone wanted to make. "The basic challenge is that not enough parents are making the decision to send their child to Jewish day school in general and the high school in particular," she said, adding that there are about 900 high-school aged Jews in Ottawa, and less than two dozen were planning to enrol in the OJCS next year.

"We have a responsibility to meet the needs not only of the 20 students who are projected to enrol in the school next year, but to the 880 other teens in our community."

Andrea Freedman

> The basic challenge is that not enough parents are making the decision to send their child to Jewish day school in general and the high school in particular

Reflecting on why there has been such a significant drop in enrolment from Grade 8 to Grade 9, Freedman said, "I think finances comes into play, but I think it is a priorities question in part, and I think it is a question of socialization. Parents are understandably concerned about sending their child to such a small school."

Freedman added that although "extraordinarily painful," it was a decision that had to be made. "We avoided it for as long as possible. But ultimately for the greater good of the community, it is a difficult decision that had to be made."

Roytenberg said that he's joined a task force that was set up at an emotional Feb. 12 community meeting at Ottawa's JCC about the school's closing.

He added that he'll keep trying to raise money for an OJCS "rescue fund." "I'm hopeful that we can raise some significant money and maybe that will help to change their minds," he said. "Ottawa has about 14,000 Jews. We ought to be able to sustain a high school. We ought to be able to raise the money to keep it going." ■

Tailor Project brought displaced persons to Canada

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In late 1947 and early 1948, representatives of the Canadian garment industry organized what became known as the Tailor Project, a plan to select more than 2,200 skilled tailors from the displaced person camps of Europe and give them jobs and housing in Canada.

The Tailor Project had been based on similar schemes that had alleviated labour shortages in the logging and mining industries. Canadian Jewish Congress, eager to rescue Holocaust survivors from the terrible limbo of displaced person camps, knew the government would approve a plan to bring in skilled workers to fill a similar shortage in the garment trades.

Congress officials, recognizing that the plan had to come from the industry itself, provided guidance from behind the scenes. "Congress was not an employer of labour and could not act as a spokesman," the late Max Enkin, a key player in the Tailor Project, explained in a 1986 recorded interview.

Hundreds of tailoring firms in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver were canvassed and many agreed to hire DP workers on 12-month contracts. In Toronto, W. Krangle and Co. Ltd. of King Street sought five persons "experienced in the sewing of men's trousers"; Brill Shirt & Neckwear Ltd. of Richmond Street wanted 30 "operators on men's fine shirts"; Coppley Noyes & Randall of Hamilton sought 10 workers; Superior Converters Ltd. of Fraser Avenue requested 25; Master-Bilt Clothes Ltd. of Spadina Avenue sought five; Nash Tailors Ltd. of College Street wanted eight; Ontario Boys Wear Ltd. of Richmond Street W. wanted seven; and so on.

Provided they had the requisite tailoring skills, both single and married displaced persons were eligible to come to Canada, but couples with more than two children and one-parent families were excluded by government fiat.

In their book None Is Too Many: Canada and the Jews of Europe 1933-1948, Irving Abella and Harold Troper tell the story of a widow from Romania with a young son who, despite her "tearful pleading," had to be rejected. However, the selection team found a single Romanian man and arranged a quick marriage; the two, sleeping in separate berths aboard ship, came to Canada with the child in February 1948 and were later divorced.

The Canadian Overseas Garment Commission, the industry's co-ordinating body, had to ensure proper housing for the thousands of expected workers. Enkin, who went to Europe as part of the selection team, telephoned from Vienna to emphasize the importance of providing accommodation.

"If there are insuperable difficulties and insoluble problems it is obvious that Mr. [Arthur] MacNamara [deputy minister of labour] would want to terminate the project," he explained, adding that "the situation of these people in the camps is appalling – they must be rescued." Many people and organizations offered accommodation, including the Hebrew National Association (Folks Farein) on Cecil Street, which provided placements for 18.

Unfortunately, the government applied a quota to the project at the 11th hour, insisting that no more than 50 per cent of the chosen tailors could be Jewish. Although Enkin and his colleagues felt they had no choice but to comply, the quota was apparently eased when the tailors began to arrive in stages.

In the four Canadian cities in which it operated, the Tailor Project unfolded with the precision of a military operation. In Toronto, each newly-arrived group was met at Union Station and transported in Red Cross station wagons to the Labour Lyceum on Spadina Avenue where the new arrivals were welcomed, given breakfast, registered, then driven by car to the homes and apartments allocated to them.

"When a [displaced person] commences work in your establishment, he has no means of sustenance," employees were advised. "Each manufacturer is, therefore, requested to advance to each [displaced person] the sum of $25 for married men and $15 for single men. We would suggest that the advances be deducted weekly in the smallest possible amounts, to enable the tailor to retain his maximum pay until such time as he may become well-established."

The Tailor Project became the template for the Furrier Project that followed and the model for bringing the Vietnamese "boat people" to Canada around 1980, Enkin said. The project also spurred the formation in 1947 of the Jewish Vocational Service of Toronto, the original purpose of which was to help survivors of World War II find employment; Enkin was its founding chairperson. ■

Amended health reform bill eases community concerns

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

The Jewish community is satisfied that the character of the institutions it has built will not be threatened by Quebec's sweeping reform of the health and social services system, and that its control of them is not too seriously diminished.

Lawyer Eric Maldoff, the lead negotiator with the government over three months on behalf of the anglophone umbrella organization, the Quebec Community Groups Network, is confident the amendments made to Bill 10 meet most of the specific concerns of the Jewish community and the six institutions to which it has historic ties.

A major victory contained in the heavily revised bill is that individual institutions will retain their owner corporations, the separate legal entities that own the institution's immoveable property. Originally, the proposed law abolished them.

The institutions' foundations also remain untouched, as do the users' committees.

Protection of the cultural and linguistic nature of the institutions has actually been strengthened, Maldoff believes.

Maldoff, who is also Quebec chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), has a long history of involvement in healthcare institutions, including chairing the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation.

"In introducing these amendments, Health Minister Gaétan Barrette has shown a willingness to demonstrate a sensitivity to our concerns and to taking significant steps to introduce positive measures to respond to them," Maldoff said.

The bill, which was introduced by Barrette in September, was passed in the wee hours of Feb. 7, after the majority Liberal government invoked closure. It contains about 180 amendments to the first version.

The Jewish institutions will, like most others in the province, lose their individual boards and be "regrouped" under 34 new regional bodies known by the acronym CISSS, whose boards of directors will be appointed by the minister. Today, the province has 182 health and social service agency boards.

Maldoff underlined that institutions that have a corporation and are recognized as bilingual (which is the case for all six Jewish institutions) are not being "amalgamated" into a CISSS, as originally envisioned, and will retain their distinct legal status.

Montreal's Jewish General Hospital, Mount Sinai Hospital, Maimonides Geriatric Centre, Jewish Eldercare Centre, and Miriam Home and Services will fall under the Centre integré de santé et de services sociaux du Centre-Ouest Montréal, along with three other institutions in that territory, while the Jewish Rehabilitation Hospital will be under a CISSS in Laval.

In a joint brief in November to the parliamentary committee studying the bill, CIJA, Federation CJA and the six institutions expressed fears that the proposed legislation threatened the institutions' religious and cultural identity. Community members' sense of belonging to them would be weakened thereby making fund raising and volunteer engagement more difficult, they said.

Maldoff said the corporations will continue to have the power to veto the sale of an institution's real estate or any change in its use with a two-thirds vote of its membership.

Eric Maldoff

In addition, corporation members will now have the power to veto – by the same majority vote – decisions by the CISSS that relate to access to services of a linguistic or cultural nature at that institution.

A two-thirds approval by the corporation members will also be required to revoke the bilingual status of an institution, which Maldoff said affords greater protection of English than existed before.

Another new feature in the bill is that each institution will have a "consultative committee" to advise the CISSS regarding the preservation of "the cultural, historic, linguistic or local character" of that institution, and to maintain a relationship with its foundation and any research activities.

That's important, said Maldoff, because it will allow the foundation to deal directly with the corporation about the raising and allocation of funds, and not have to go through the CISSS.

As for representation on CISSS boards, Maldoff thinks the Jewish community will have a strong voice in the CISSS Centre-Ouest Montréal, with the majority of the associated institutions being Jewish.

Ten of the 19 board members are to be "independent," selected from a list submitted by a seven-member "expert committee," which includes three past presidents of the institutions under the CISSS.

As for the JRH, Maldoff said, "it has more recognition of its status than it had before."

Maldoff added that the separate boards the institutions now have are not as firmly controlled by the Jewish community as perceived. Each seat is designated for different stakeholders, including various staff categories, users and the public.

"They are not exactly created by the community… the community could not just put who they want on them," he said.

Maldoff said he did not know how many administrative jobs will be eliminated at the institutions. "The bill says that all senior management jobs will end on April 1, but they are being asked to reapply for positions."

One of the main aims of Bill 10 is to reduce costs by cutting bureaucracy, and the law abolishes the intermediary Agences de la santé et des services sociaux throughout the province.

In a Feb. 9 statement, CIJA Quebec vice-president Luciano Del Negro said: "Ideally, we would have preferred a different solution to the problems facing our health care system, but, at first glance, the Jewish community is satisfied that the amendments introduced to the bill will ensure that the network of health and social service institutions will continue to remain responsive to the needs of our community and the wider Quebec society." ■

Azrieli Foundation donates $5 million to Birthright

CJN STAFF

Enabling more young Jewish adults with developmental or physical disabilities to participate in Birthright Israel is one of the goals of the Azrieli Foundation, which last week announced a $5-million donation over five years to the program.

Foundation chief operating officer Dena Libman said the gift is intended to ensure that no eligible person with special needs is prevented from taking part in the free 10-day educational trip to Israel because of financial considerations.

Birthright Israel does organize trips designed for those with disabilities, and does a good job of it, she said. However, there are extra costs. Participants may need a shadow to accompany them, for example, or those using wheelchairs require special adapted buses.

Birthright trips include a mifgash program in which the Diaspora Jews dialogue with their Israeli peers. On trips for those with special needs, participants meet Israelis with disabilities, Libman said.

The Toronto-based Azrieli Foundation hopes that with this new funding, Birthright will publicize and actively recruit eligible people with special needs, she said. Canadian agencies such as the Reena Foundation in Toronto and Miriam Foundation in Montreal, which work with disabled adults, can play a role in that effort, she added.

Supporting Birthright fits the Azrieli Foundation's mandate of promoting education and connection with Israel, she said. Since 2012, the Toronto-based foundation has been providing funds to Maccabi Canada's Israel experience program for young people.

The Azrieli Foundation is also committed to enhancing the quality of life and continuing education for adults with developmental disabilities. In addition, it supports research into neurodevelopmental disorders and particularly Fragile X syndrome, one of the most common inherited forms of developmental impairment.

Last week's donation, which includes a matching gift, or challenge grant, component, was made to the Birthright Israel Foundation of Canada. It will also be used to increase the opportunity for able Canadians to take part. Currently, Birthright receives more applications from Canadians than it can accommodate, Libman said.

Also last week, American billionaire casino mogul Sheldon Adelson's family foundation has announced that it will be donating another $40 million to the Birthright Israel Foundation, with a $20-million challenge grant, to add to the $140 million it has already given.

The Azrieli Foundation will also be contributing its resources to the Holocaust educational component of Birthright trips. The foundation has for the past decade been collecting and publishing the memoirs of survivors living in Canada.

More than 50 books have been published and, in the past couple of years, about 20 videos based on interviews with the memoirs' authors have been produced.

These short films will be made available for screening at the preparatory program held the evening before Birthright groups visit Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem, as all groups do, Libman said. The books will be offered free of charge to participants before or after their trip.

The Azrieli Foundation is challenging other philanthropists to contribute to the Birthright Israel Foundation of Canada through a matching gift program, with no cap set.

Since 2000, approximately 350,000 young adults from more than 60 countries have gone on Birthright trips. ■

Too soon to mourn demise of the deli

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Some are calling it the end of an era. A string of Toronto's deli-style Jewish establishments along the Bathurst Street corridor have recently closed – from Marky's Deli & Restaurant in 2012 to Moe Pancer's Deli last month.

And Daiter's Fresh Market will officially shutter this spring.

The closures seem to suggest that Jewish fare of the traditional eastern European variety is in decline.

And certainly, a shift in North American Jewish food culture has been in the works for several decades, as both the kosher and "kosher-style" commercial centres in cities like Toronto have moved on somewhat from Ashkenazi staples – foods including smoked meat and brisket – to Mediterranean, Israeli-influenced cuisine.

The old-world Jewish delicatessens and shops established from roughly the 1930s to 1950s by eastern European Jewish immigrants, have, in many ways, been supplanted by falafel, hummus and Israeli salad eateries, both kosher and not – think King David Pizza, Tov-Li, Dr. Laffa and Aroma Espresso Bar (the chain has announced it will open its first kosher location this spring).

Toronto food writer David Sax's 2009 book Save the Deli explores the Jewish deli's waning popularity from the 1970s to 1990s, when Jewish immigration from eastern Europe (with the exception of Soviet Jewry) dropped off, and deli fare become less central to subsequent generations of North American Jews.

"For younger generations, their grandparents may have eaten knishes on a daily basis, their parents on a weekly basis... They only have it on holidays," Sax said.

Further, from the 1980s to the early 2000s, Sax said, Israel became the cultural centrepiece for many Canadian Jews.

"All of a sudden, there was hummus and falafel everywhere. And that's only grown in recent years, as more [Canadians] travel to Israel because of trips like Birthright, and as Israeli food becomes more respected globally."

He cited the bestselling 2011 cookbook Jerusalem: A Cookbook, written by Jewish and Arab chefs Yotam Ottolenghi and Sami Tamimi.

"Go to any house in [upscale Toronto neighbourhoods] Rosedale or High Park, and Jerusalem is there next to Julia Child – that food is now part of the greater culinary zeitgeist."

Still, the popularity of Middle Eastern cuisine and the disappearance of some deli mainstays haven't, it turns out, spelled the deli's demise in Canada.

In Montreal, the Jewish-style deli remains a cultural linchpin for locals and tourists of varying backgrounds, albeit not for the kosher set.

Katherine Romanow, 30, and her friend Sydney Warshaw run The Wandering Chew in Montreal, which offers pop-up dinners in various places, focusing on lesser-known Jewish ethnic cuisines.

"On the kosher food scene," Romanow said, "as far as I know, nothing new has opened recently. Outside that, there are the mainstays like Schwartz's deli... There's no decline in interest there."

In Toronto, the last five or so years have seen several new Jewish food trends, including the emergence of nouveau Jewish delis and chefs putting contemporary spins on standard Ashkenazi fare.

The "nouveau Jewish delicatessen," as Sax dubbed it, began to spring up around 2007 with places like downtown Toronto's popular, Jewish-style deli Caplansky's. And native Montrealer Noah Bernamoff's Mile End Deli in New York City opened 2010.

These spots and their success heralded a return to the homespun Jewish deli.

"From the 1950s onward," Sax said, "Jewish delis were increasingly industrialized. Instead of making meat or bread in-house, they would buy it, because it was cheaper and easier. It would then be made with more preservatives and chemicals. What these new delis started doing is going back to basics – making their own bread, curing and smoking meat from scratch."

Though the trend has lagged a bit on the kosher scene, in 2013, Ben Venasio and Izzy Bernath opened what Sax called "the first nouveau kosher delicatessen anywhere in North America."

Ben & Izzy's, at Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue, serves meats hand-cured and smoked daily by Venasio.

"In my opinion, Venasio said, "there's an oversaturation of Middle Eastern kosher restaurants in the city. And I thought it was really sad that there were all these Jewish-style delis opening, but no honest-to-God, kosher deli where people could get properly cured meats and not stuff from a factory."

Close on the heels of the new deli trend has been a recent outcrop of trendy, non-kosher, Mediterranean-eastern European fusion restaurants.

In 2014, chef Anthony Rose opened Fat Pasha, an eastern European-Middle Eastern fusion restaurant on Dupont Street. It features Israeli salads and falafel alongside schmaltz fried rice, brisket and gravlax.

Behind it is his smoked fish shop, Schmaltz Appetizing, which also opened last year.

There's also Essen, a Dundas Street West establishment opened in September by Leor Zimerman, which features a hybrid of Mediterranean and eastern European – though not, Zimerman stressed, deli-style food – and what he called a "yiddishe vibe."

"My branding leans towards that kind of esthetic," he explained.

Essen's menu contains cabbage rolls, brisket and chopped liver, but also falafel, za'atar and shakshuka.

In Montreal, innovation is also stirring, though more gradually.

About a year ago, chef Jeffrey Finkelstein opened Hof Kelstein, a trendy spot on St.-Laurent Boulevard that serves borscht, matzah ball soup and challah, plus shakshuka and schnitzel.

"It's in line with this new Jewish food trend of taking staples and modernizing them, making them appeal to people in their 20s and 30s," Romanow commented.

Her venture, The Wandering Chew, is another such attempt.

By hosting feasts informed by diverse Jewish communities, from Iraqi-Jewish to Scandinavian-Jewish, their goal, she said, "is to show people Jewish food can be delicious, but also introduce the variety of cuisine that makes up Jewish food."

Sax attributes the rise of hybridized Jewish fare to the fact that Jews' sense of self in Canada "isn't strictly Ashkenazi, Mizrachi or Sephardic. It's this blended identity... We're just – Jewish. If you go to a kosher supermarket on Bathurst, it's the same. Everybody wants all of it."

While there's undoubtedly a changing of the guard at play, Jewish chefs are increasingly finding their way back to Jewish food culture's eastern European roots, be it through innovating the staples or resurrecting the Jewish deli. ■

Child abuse allegations shock the Australian Jewish community

AARON KALMAN
SYDNEY

Cases of alleged child abuse at Chabad educational institutions in Sydney and Melbourne have shaken not only the Australian Jewish community but the entire nation, after a court heard testimonies last week as part of the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Sexual Abuse.

Early last week the commission heard from victims who suffered under the hands of three former employees of Jewish day school institutions: Daniel Hayman, former director of Yeshiva Bondi, Melbourne youth leader David Kramer and Melbourne security guard David Cyprys. All three have been convicted for their actions.

Manny Waks, an international crusader against child abuse, is the only victim from Melbourne who has broken the community's code of silence and spoken publicly.

"I know that there are many within the Chabad/yeshiva community and some within the broader Jewish community who wish that I would be quiet about what happened to me and also in relation to my advocacy and support of others. However, I feel that as a community we need to learn from the past in order to address the future. I believe that this is something that is owed both to victims/survivors and to the broader community," Waks told the commission.

Waks was abused by two different Jewish educators as a child, and according to Zephaniah, his father, two of his younger brothers were abused by a third individual.

The Waks family said it has been ostracized by its former Chabad community.

"We felt suddenly reduced to nothing and had lost all our friends," Zephaniah told the commission.

"Going public with my story over two years ago, assisting many other victims of child sexual abuse and in some cases their families, and working to protect other children within our community, has been a great part of my healing process... The decades of living in silence with the shame, guilt and anger have been shattered. Importantly, it has provided me the opportunity to turn a tragedy into a positive – something that has benefitted me and, I hope, many others," said Manny Waks.

One witness who gave testimony, known as AVB, said Melbourne's yeshiva had a "culture of enablers" in sexual abuse cases. AVB was abused as a 10-year-old, some 20 years ago, at Yeshiva Bondi, and by a faculty member from Yeshiva Melbourne.

"There is a fundamental cultural dynamic that hasn't been addressed. Nothing is going to change," he stated.

Australia's Royal Commission, set up in 2013 by the federal government, is investigating the institutional environment at places known for child abuse. The list includes a church, a yoga ashram and other educational and recreational bodies. Two Jewish institutions, one in Sydney and one in Melbourne, are also on the list.

The testimony given by AVB indicated the institutionalized abuse against him didn't end when he became an adult, but rather resurfaced when he approached the police some three years ago.

After vociferous public outcry, prominent yeshiva figure Rabbi Yosef Feldman resigned on Feb. 10 from his position as a director on the Board of Management of The Yeshiva Centre, according to J-Wire.

His testimony at the commission appeared to lend credence to AVB's allegations of continued institutional coverups in his request to the Royal Commission for more leniency for convicted pedophiles.

"I would be asking for more leniency on people who have shown that they haven't offended in the last 20 years or decades ago, and have psychological analyses that this is the case," Rabbi Feldman said. "Once someone is not a pedophile any more or is showing [he] is not acting wrongly any more, that should be considered in a very strong way."

Rabbi Feldman's statements were met with fierce resistance within the Australian Jewish establishment, with NSW Jewish Board of Deputies president Jeremy Spinak saying via a written statement that Feldman should be barred from a position of authority.

"The evidence which has emerged in the last two weeks has been absolutely disgraceful. It reflects appalling failures in dealing with incidents of child abuse and protecting children in care," Spinak said.

"While these awful events occurred in a small section of our community it is now up to all of us to ensure that the abhorrent practices, attitudes and failures that have come to light never again happen. It is our view that after his appalling comments to the Royal Commission Rabbi Yosef Feldman is unfit to hold any position of authority or leadership in the Jewish community."

Rabbi James Kennard, principal of the Mount Scopus Memorial College, one of the largest Jewish schools in Australia, called on Feldman to resign from his current positions.

"While anyone who held a position of leadership in the yeshiva community in the period when these terrible mistakes were made remains in such a position today, the community is not able to say that it has learnt and it has changed," Rabbi Kennard said.

"The resignations that are required need not be an acceptance of personal responsibility, but an acknowledgment that if abuse, or a failure to deal properly with abusers, took place on an individual's watch, then it is honourable and right for such an individual to step down," Rabbi Kennard said. ■

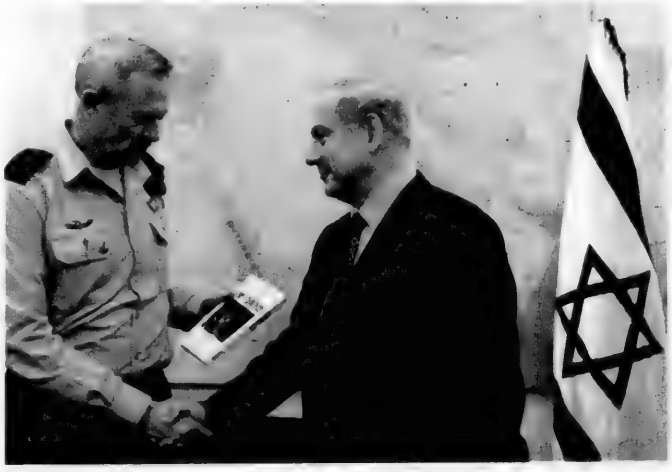
SeeJN | IDF commander says farewell



HAIM ZACH/GPO

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with outgoing Chief of Staff Beni Gantz at his Tel Aviv office last week. Gantz completed a four-year term of service as the IDF's top commander on Sunday, having shepherded the army through the Arab uprisings, the rise and fall of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, the cyclonic civil war in Syria, and the ever deteriorating security situation along Israel's border lands.

Jerusalem's Tower of David Museum goes digital

LINDA GRADSTEIN
JERUSALEM

How many times have you toured a museum with a bored child who won't get off his iPad? Now, the Tower of David in Jerusalem's Old City is offering a way to use iPads, tablets and other technology to keep kids (and adults) interested in the exhibits.

"The idea is to make the Tower of David accessible for the new generation by using the best of digital technology to reveal the ancient stones," Rose Ginosaur, the director of development for the museum told The Media Line.

Visitors will rent iPads or Samsung tablets that are preloaded with the technology. For example, there is the Augmenti Guide to help explain the 360 degree view of Jerusalem from one of the museum's towers.

"It's like the old audio guides, but it's an audio-visual guide," Alon Fishman, who developed the mobile geospatial technology based on his experience in the army, said. "It augments the real life that you see through the camera."

The map offers "pins" that you can click on for an audio and video explanation of many of the buildings you are seeing. As you move, the map moves with you, offering different "pins" each time.

"This is the first time this technology is being used for civilian use," Fishman said, adding that the patent is pending.

Inside the museum, for $6(US) visitors can rent an iPad that is preloaded with a game called "Swipe the Citadel." An archeologist tells the user that his daughter is lost somewhere in the museum and asks for help to find her. The game is made for children between the ages of seven and 12, and takes the kids on a 90-minute tour throughout the museum, asking them to answer questions to get the next clue.

Prof. Tzvika Kuflik of the University of Haifa had his students develop some of the technology content as part of their final projects for his course. He says this kind of interactive technology will soon be used around the world.

"We are living in an era where the environment interacts with us," he said. "My research is in using real technologies to enhance the museum experience.

Those who don't want to rent a tablet can use QR codes on their smartphones. There are two sets of QR codes. The QR codes meant for children send them on a scavenger-like route through the museum. Those meant for adults give more information including photos of what parts of the museum looked like in the past.

The museum, which boasts an ancient citadel with foundations that date back more than 2,000 years, has long attracted visitors with both indoor and outdoor exhibits, along with stunning views of Jerusalem. About 300,000 visitors come to the museum each year – about half are from abroad, and half are Israeli.

"We want Israelis who live here to come back again and again," Ginosaur said. "Once they come and play Swipe the Citadel. Another time they use the Augmenti Guide. Another time they just wander around and use the QR codes."

There is also a newly discovered moat surrounding remains of King Herod's palace. Part of the new technology is a special large television screen that shows a 3D film even during daylight. The film shows what Herod's palace may have looked like at its height about 2,000 years ago. ■

Jerusalem to provide services for neighbourhoods beyond the fence

ELHANAN MILLER
JERUSALEM

Struggling to provide municipal services to Arab neighbourhoods beyond the security barrier, Jerusalem city officials have turned to the Israel Defence Forces for advice on hiring contractors to accommodate thousands of residents isolated from both Israel and the Palestinian territories, Mayor Nir Barkat said last week.

The move to ask the Civil Administration in the West Bank, the IDF body tasked with civil matters in the Israeli-controlled parts of the West Bank, comes a month after the city was rapped by the High Court for failing to provide basic services, such as mail and water supply, in Arab neighbourhoods of the city beyond the fence.

"It's tougher to serve the Arab neighbourhoods on the other side of the fence," Barkat admitted in a conversation with journalists at his office.

"It's tougher because [municipal service providers] need more police escort. However, when you want to create change, you start with the easy places and then, in the next phases, its easier to go to other places."

The court asked city hall to justify the extreme gaps in services between Jewish West Jerusalem and Arab neighbourhoods lying beyond the municipal concrete barrier in the East.

While most of Jerusalem, including the eastern side of the city captured in 1967, sits west of the barrier, several Arab neighbourhoods, namely Shuafat Refugee Camp, Ras Khamis and Ras Shehadah, were left on the east side of the wall but still inside the city, creating what some officials have described as a no-go zone inside the capital.

The number of Palestinian residents excluded by the barrier was recently estimated by the Israeli water company Mekorot at 80,000.

Barkat, who has been serving as Jerusalem's mayor since 2008 and is considered close to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, raised the ire of politicians on the right when in 2011 he was quoted as saying that he believed the city should redraw it borders based on the position of the barrier.

"We should forgo municipal areas outside of it and annex territories trapped on the Israeli side, which are not under the city's municipal jurisdiction," he told graduates of the National Security Academy, according to news website NRG.

But on Feb. 12, Barkat sounded confident that Jerusalem should practise its sovereignty on both sides of the security barrier, through an equal level of services across the city.

"Clearly, we intend to have everything also on the other side of the fence," he said. "But as an entrepreneur, you start with areas where you can show a proof of concept and create a positive experience in the Arab neighbourhoods [within the barrier], and then you scale."

Barkat said he has asked Netanyahu for additional assistance to serve neighbourhoods beyond the barrier.

"I'm talking about budgets and [army] escorting," he said. "We could probably outsource services we need to provide. We asked the Civil Administration to help us do outsourcing on the other side, at our expense. I'm committed to serve residents on the other side of the fence as well, even if it's tougher."

Addressing the wave of violence which plagued the city following the apparently nationalistic kidnapping and murder of Palestinian teenager Mohammed Abu Khdeir last July, Barkat opined that rioting in Arab East Jerusalem reflected more an educational crisis than a political one.

"The violence came from teenagers, mostly under the age of 18," he said. "The Facebook generation across the world doesn't listen to its parents, or anyone else."

The Jerusalem Municipality has devised a carrot and stick approach to tackle disturbances to public order, he said.

The plan includes a longer school day, ending at 6 p.m., filled with sports and other extracurricular activities to keep East Jerusalem teenagers off the streets. On the other hand, Barkat vowed to deploy more policemen in Arab neighbourhoods and maintain "a very tough and aggressive" stance against "those who take the law into their own hands."

Education is also an acute problem in Arab East Jerusalem, Barkat acknowledged, with a shortage of some 1,000 classrooms and a high dropout rate. He insisted, however, the problem is similar in scope to that of the city's ultra-Orthodox neighbourhoods.

In the Arab neighbourhoods, the municipality is trying to tackle the crisis by building an additional 100 classrooms a year (which he hopes will double to 200); convincing women to postpone marriage until after graduation; and by using the Israeli bagrut matriculation exam to supplant the Palestinian tawjihi in Arab schools.

"The majority of Arab residents realize there's already positive change," he said. ■

Wiesel urges Obama to attend Bibi's speech

JTA
WASHINGTON

Elie Wiesel urged American President Barack Obama and Congress to put aside their differences over Benjamin Netanyahu's speech to the body next month, saying the Israeli prime minister's message on Iran was too important.

"I plead with you to put aside the politics that have obscured the critical decisions to be made," the Holocaust memoirist and Nobel Peace laureate said in an ad promoted last week by Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, a one-time Republican candidate for Congress who has sharply criticized the push-back against the planned speech.

"Surely it is within your power to find a solution that will permit Israel's prime minister to deliver his urgent message," Wiesel says in the full page newspaper ad. Washington has been roiled by the invitation to Netanyahu to address Congress on March 3, issued by John Boehner, the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives without consulting congressional Democrats and Obama.

Obama and other top administration officials will not meet with Netanyahu during the visit, citing its proximity to Israeli elections March 17, and some Democratic lawmakers say they will not attend the speech as the invitation violates protocol.

Boehner invited Netanyahu in part so the Israeli leader could rebut Obama's support for nuclear talks with Iran, which Obama says is constructive and Netanyahu and Republicans believe will leave Iran on the threshold of becoming a nuclear weapon state.

Wiesel likened the modern Iranian leaders to the biblical Haman, noting the speech will take place on the eve of Purim.

"As Queen Esther said when addressing her king: 'How can I behold the destruction of my people?'" he says in the ad.

Separately, three top Jewish Democrats in Congress asked Boehner to address allegations by Israeli officials that he failed to inform them that he had not properly cleared the speech.

The letter from Nita Lowey, the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, Steve Israel, who ran the last two House elections for Democrats, and Ted Deutch, the top Democrat on the House Middle East subcommittee, quoted Ron Dermer, the Israeli ambassador to Washington, and Tzachi Hanegbi, the deputy foreign minister.

Dermer and Boehner began organizing the invitation on Jan. 8, and Dermer has said that Boehner told him that informing others of the invitation was the speaker's prerogative, an account Boehner has confirmed. Hanegbi has said that Boehner implied that it was a bipartisan invitation and that Israeli officials were not aware Democrats were kept in the dark.

"Why didn't you notify and co-ordinate ahead of time with the administration?" ask the lawmakers, who say they will nonetheless attend the speech. They also ask if Hanegbi "was right in saying you engaged in a one-sided move instead of a move approved by both sides?"

Boehner has said that his office informed the White House of the planned invitation the morning of Jan. 21, before making the invitation public. It is not clear how much notice Boehner gave the White House, and his office did not respond to a query, but Boehner posted the invitation on Twitter that morning at 9:35 a.m. ■

Dance show a milestone in Israeli choreography

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Two Room Apartment, a show in which two Israeli artists, a dancer and an actor by training, reflect on their relationship as life partners and as creators, has its Canadian premiere during Toronto's Spotlight on Israeli Culture showcase. Declared the best performance of the year for 2013 by the Israeli Dance Critics Circle, the show is a combination of dance, performance art and physical theatre.

Two Room Apartment is a reworking of a show of the same name that was originally created for a male and female couple and is considered a milestone in independent Israeli choreography.

Dancer Niv Sheinfeld and actor Oren Laor recreated the piece for two men. Sheinfeld, 42, and Laor, 43, who are based in Tel Aviv, have been life partners for almost 13 years ago and they've been working together for about 10 years.

"We always spoke about doing a duet and we did work together, but the two of us had never been on stage together," Sheinfeld said via Skype from Nahariya in northern Israel.

Sheinfeld spent five years as part of a dance company run by Nir Ben-Gal and Liat Dror, the two choreographers who developed the original version of Two Room Apartment. Initially, Sheinfeld and Laor set out to perform the 1987 performance of Two Room Apartment, "exactly as it was then," Sheinfeld said. "But it was not really reflecting us as a couple or as artists."

> We took the freedom to change stuff that did not reflect our relationship and was dated

Laor added, "We took the freedom to change stuff that did not reflect our relationship and was dated."

They toned down the eroticism of the original piece, eliminating a sexually charged scene, and focused on the emotional side of their relationship instead.

"For us, it could not be sexual after so many years together," Laor said. They personalized the piece further by adding a favourite song, Goodbye Yellow Brick Road by Elton John, and a cover version of the song by the Swedish rock band Vains of Jenna to the show's original score by Ori Vikislavski. "Elton John is not afraid to be emotional," Laor said. "It's a comic-tragic song and something grabbed us there."

Laor and Sheinfeld aim for a sense of immediacy in their performances of Two Room Apartment. Laor pointed out that theatre audiences may know a show is happening in the moment, but they don't always feel it, an obstacle he and his partner try to overcome.

Sheinfeld said they try to convey the sense of "being here and now" and that they are sharing time with their audiences. They've been performing Two Room Apartment internationally, to glowing reviews, since the show debuted in Tel Aviv in 2012.

Inside Israel, dance is thriving. "The combination of range and quality of Israel's dance scene is one of its most extraordinary aspects," according to the Israel Ministry of Tourism website.

Almost every day you can find two or three different dance performances in Tel Aviv, Sheinfeld said.

Laor added that funding from the government has helped the dance scene there to flourish. Sheinfeld said that Israeli modern dance is characterized by its physicality. "The sense of power in movement is strong," he said.

But he sees changes ahead, with an intellectual aspect merging with the "very raw" physicality.

Two Room Apartment will be performed on Feb. 26 and 28 at 8 p.m. and March 1 at 3 p.m. at the Dancemakers Centre for Creation, 9 Trinity St., Studio #313 (3rd floor), Toronto. Tickets are $25 (general) and $20 for students and seniors. A master class for dancers takes place on Feb. 27, 1 to 4 p.m. For tickets and information, visit dancemakers.org or phone 416-367-1800. ■

Five-minute pitch leads to feature-length film

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It all began with a five-minute pitch. Aspiring Toronto-based filmmaker Daniel Perlmutter stood in a room of industry experts, including director Ivan Reitman, for the Pitch This competition at the 2009 Toronto International Film Festival.

Perlmutter was trying to sell an idea about a newspaper reporter who makes up stories based on the plots of old movies to boost the dying paper's circulation.

"I had a really rough draft of a very silly film," Perlmutter tells The CJN. "The idea was to pitch to get some development money to go write a script. Actually, working on the pitch helped me figure out what the movie should be."

The pitch only took five minutes. However, as soon as Perlmutter won the competition and prize money, it was a five-year wait until the film with that quirky synopsis would see its first audience.

That comedy, Big News From Grand Rock, is currently screening in small towns across the country as part of TIFF's Film Circuit. It will also open in Toronto, Ottawa, Calgary and Edmonton on Feb. 27.

Budgeted at $1.2 million, Big News From Grand Rock was a big leap for Perlmutter. Prior to filming, his biggest big-screen credit was writing and producing the micro-budget comedy Peepers, which he made as a member of Automatic Vaudeville Studios (AVS).

AVS, which Perlmutter co-founded, uses the same company of actors and crew members to make a variety of low-budget genre movies and experimental shorts. Perlmutter says it was like an alternative to film school, and gave the aspiring director the freedom to hone his craft.

As a young man in his 20s in Montreal, Perlmutter was also lucky to get a job running a writers' room – an English-language one, too – for a YTV series called Seriously Weird. It was that small-screen work, often done on deadline, that Perlmutter says taught him about discipline and the importance of re-writing.

"[It was about] figuring out how not to be precious, and how to be able to break down everything you've worked on and see what's really not working and let go of things," he says.

Those lessons proved to be valuable when he was writing (and re-writing) Big News From Grand Rock. He says the story began as something more silly and absurd and slowly moved into a more grounded tale.

In the current film, the main crisis is that the small-town paper where protagonist Leonard works struggles to stay afloat. This brought a timeliness to the story that situates it within the modern fragmented media landscape, where many small papers are shutting down.

"So many of these towns are just holding onto their newspaper or they've lost them," Perlmutter says. "Midland lost their newspaper in June and we started filming there in September. Those communities really feel it."

Despite the serious topic, Big News From Grand Rock has a light tone and screwball flavour. Perlmutter tells The CJN that he did not want to rely much on vulgar, R-rated jokes, since family comedies are so rare in contemporary cinema.

While refining the script, Perlmutter applied to the Telefilm Canada Features Comedy Lab, a development program of the Canadian Film Centre (CFC). There, he got input and direction from various heralded people in the industry, including producer Daniel Goldberg (The Hangover), writer Kirsten Smith (Legally Blonde) and The Devil Wears Prada director David Frankel.

"It's something that's kind of rare in Canada," he says of the Comedy Lab. "It focuses on how to make films successful, not just how to get them made."

Daniel Perlmutter spent five years working on Big News From Grand Rock.

Another big help came from one of Perlmutter's comedy heroes. Eugene Levy chose to mentor Perlmutter as part of a program co-sponsored by the CFC, and gave advice on a few drafts of his screenplay.

"He was very honest and very upfront, in a great way," Perlmutter says of the SCTV and American Pie star. Due to Levy's schedule, though, he could not star in the final film.

After several years of getting Big News From Grand Rock together, the shoot in Midland, Ont., only lasted 18 days. Since no feature film had ever been made in the town, locals helped out in various ways, from bringing wardrobe options to the set to starring in bit parts.

The film is stocked with talented Canadian comics, including The Listener's Ennis Esmer as Leonard and Gordon Pinsent as the owner of the struggling paper.

"[Pinsent] came in and all of a sudden, there was a new atmosphere on set," Perlmutter says. "You can feel that everybody was bringing up their game."

Perlmutter is now getting another film into development, a horror comedy set in the woods that is limited to a few locations and characters. He says he hopes to shoot it next winter.

"I'm hoping the next one doesn't take five years," he says. "But we'll see." ■

Cast: Ronit Elkabetz, Menashe Noy, Simon Abkarian, Sasson Gabai

Event Date: Sunday, February 22

Two Screening Times: 1:00pm & 4:00pm

Location: Cineplex Cinemas Empress Walk, 5095 Yonge St. (North York Centre subway station)

Tickets: $15 Available in advance
(Cash only at door, subject to availability)

Coffee and tea will be available in-theatre immediately prior to screening.

Winner of Best Film at the 2014 Jerusalem Film Festival and Israel's submission for the 2015 Academy Awards.

Viviane Amsalem (Ronit Elkabetz, The Band's Visit) desperately craves a divorce from her controlling husband, but since there is no civil divorce in Israel, she is at the mercy of her unpredictable husband and the rabbinical courts. The airtight script balances the indignities that Viviane is forced to endure with moments of Kafkaesque humour that underscore the absurdity of a 21st century woman whose freedom is curtailed by archaic biblical laws. A powerful critique of faith and gender politics in Israel.

NORMAN DOIDGE EXAMINES OUR HIDDEN CEREBRAL POWERS IN 'THE BRAIN'S WAY OF HEALING'

I've been a fan of Toronto author and psychiatrist Norman Doidge for many years, ever since – if memory serves – he won a high-profile Canadian essay contest for a piece on the power of evil entities to beguile Western leaders, specifically referring to Yasser Arafat's terrorist organization. His essay on Evil's Advantage Over Conscience, written well over a decade ago, is still in currency on the Internet, containing blazing insights such as:

"... Arafat is always playing upon the conscience of the West, especially by his endless recourse to 'international law' and invocation of 'human rights,' an utterly brazen ploy coming from a terrorist."

Doidge has also written extensively about his specialty, the human brain. His 2008 book, The Brain That Changes Itself, became an international bestseller, and his new book – The Brain's Way of Healing: Remarkable Discoveries and Recoveries from the Frontiers of Neuroplasticity – seems equally fascinating and readable, and thus equally likely to follow that same neural pathway to success.

A common perception persists that the human brain, for all of its sophistication, cannot easily regenerate mental abilities lost through damage or disease. Doidge turns this old belief on its head. Utilizing a robust and eclectic assortment of anecdotes and stories of medical discoveries and advances, he demonstrates how the brain has enormous hidden transformative powers.

Famed neurologist-author Oliver Sacks described Doidge's first book as "a remarkable and hopeful portrait of the endless adaptability of the human brain," a description that could easily apply to the new book as well. The publisher is Viking.

The Best Way to Experience Israel

Ten-year-old Toronto twins perform on The Ellen Show

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

January was a hectic month for Abby and Sarah Ginsburg.

On Jan. 28, the 10-year-old Toronto twins performed a medley of Sam Smith songs for Ellen DeGeneres on The Ellen Show.

"It all happened very suddenly," said the twins' mother, Liane Ginsburg.

At the suggestion of their guitar teacher, Elliot Bernstein, Abby and Sarah recorded a video and uploaded it to YouTube. Singing and playing guitar, the girls performed their own arrangement of I'm Yours by Jason Mraz.

"The video was posted in fun and was sent to 30 friends," said Ginsburg.

Unbeknownst to the family, a close friend of Liane's sent the video to The Ellen Show.

"Within a week of posting the video, and a day or two of its being submitted, I got a call from a representative of The Ellen Show, telling us, 'The girls might want to send a little video for Ellen.' So the girls performed a combination of two Sam Smith songs with a message to Ellen, 'We hear you like Sam Smith so we hope you like the song,' and posted the new video on EllenTube," said Ginsburg.

Less than two weeks later, the family got the phone call saying Ellen wanted them on the show.

"We were in Los Angeles five days later!" said Ginsburg.

Sarah, left, and Abby Ginsburg with the autographed guitars they received on The Ellen Show.

Ellen welcomed the girls and, as they are identical twins, she made a little joke offering them name-tags to tell them apart.

After their performance, Ellen gifted the girls with new guitars and invited them back the next day to meet Smith who would be performing.

"We didn't know they were going to be invited back," their mother says. "That was a complete surprise to us. Sam gave the girls at least two hugs and signed their new guitars. They were over the moon and so was I," said Ginsburg.

The twins were "discovered" at a summer camp music program by vocal coach Michelle Newman when they were just four years old. They then began singing lessons.

Abby and Sarah's confidence grew with each passing year as they performed in musical theatre and school and camp productions. They began piano and guitar lessons.

"I would work with them separately until two years ago. We have now started doing harmonies, and that's when it became magical. I think they were born with it – an old soul when they sing. A tone comes out of their voice. I don't think it can even be taught. They were born with something special," Newman says.

Not only do the girls look the same, but they share the same personality traits, are best friends, and are always singing.

"We had a once-in-a-lifetime experience that we will never forget," Abby said.

Their message for other young talent? "Just do what you love. Do it for yourself and it doesn't matter what other people think – only what you think. Do it while you can – while you love it," Sarah said. ■

CORRECTION

The story "Jazz singer identifies with her Jewish family," (Jan. 29) incorrectly says that Sophia Perlman's father was raised in an interfaith family. In fact both his grandmother and grandfather were Jewish. The CJN apologizes for the error.

Life-altering illness leads author to write fiction

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Mireille Silcoff

Back in 2004, Mireille Silcoff was a sought-after journalist living a peripatetic life as founding editor of Guilt & Pleasure Quarterly, a magazine of new Jewish writing and ideas; an author of three books about drug and youth culture; a lead columnist with the National Post; and a frequent contributor to the New York Times Magazine.

Silcoff spoke to the The CJN from her home in Montreal about her book, a collection of eight stories, Chez l'arabe, launched last August by House of Anansi Press.

"I was living in Toronto doing most of my work in New York, and my fiancé, to who I am now married, was living in Montreal – a crazy existence. I was on an airplane all the time," recalled Silcoff.

Silcoff was forced to give up her career when she was diagnosed with a rare genetic chronic condition: spontaneous cerebrospinal fluid leak.

"I went through this harrowing process. I had to abandon everything as I became more and more ill. I stopped writing. I became a very sick woman at the age of 31," Silcoff, now 42, said.

Her spinal fluid leaked, and it couldn't function as a natural cushion for her brain. Her brain sunk into her skull leaving her in agony.

Confined to a bed, it took her a slow span of over half a decade to get better.

Silcoff couldn't hear, speak, or move for many weeks. "I was completely like a husk," she said.

It was during that period that she began writing. She started off with poetry, moved on to writing letters, then shifted to fiction. She wrote the title story in 10-15 minute bursts everyday.

"Chez L'arabe is a story about two people from opposing sides who find themselves together in a foxhole, forging a friendship in the weirdest way one can be forged," Silcoff said.

Surprisingly, Silcoff realized fiction was something she could do.

"I never entertained the notion of being a fiction writer before. I was very happy in the world of non-fiction. I continued writing the other stories, but it was a much more laborious process. I knew that first story would lead to a book and eventually – six years later – I did have a book," said Silcoff,.

Silcoff grew up in Jewish Montreal and lives there today; a place that provides a rich setting, drawing moments of familiarity to its readers.

"There could be a nostalgic love quality to my writing," she said.

The theme which holds the stories together is threads of other people's lives that have been upended – through strained relations, marital dissatisfaction, professional limbo, and illness. Silcoff's stories are detailed and infused with humour and touching emotional insights into the human condition.

Half of Chez L'arabe was written lying in bed writing in notebooks. Silcoff then graduated to using a laptop on a specially designed easel that she could use while in bed.

"When I was able to sit up, I would write a bit everyday at a desk. It was a very incremental process," she said.

"I am still going through it. I will always have this syndrome, it's just a lot better than it was but it's something I will live with for the rest of my life.

"I think in a funny way the book is a record of my healing. When one reads the book, it can be seen that there is a trajectory of a certain character in four linked stories, and, as these stories progress, in each story she is getting better. That was really happening to me as well," she explained.

Where does autobiography end and fiction begin?

"Everybody takes from their lives. I do have an Israeli mother who, in certain ways, is similar to the mother in the book," Silcoff says.

"My mom [Yaffa Meir Handel] was quite a well-known Israeli folk dancer in Tel Aviv before she immigrated to Canada in the 1960s. The mother character in the story has many of my mom's qualities but not many of her better qualities.

"You pick and choose what you think will make for good fiction, good tension, good stories. Many of the details in the book are called from my own life – but nothing in the book truly happened to me," she emphasized. ■

Modern interpretations of peshat or 'plain' meaning of biblical passages

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jews have been composing commentaries on the Torah for over 2,000 years. Surprisingly, we still have not run out of valuable new insights, even about the "plain" meaning or peshat.

Broadly speaking, Jewish Bible commentaries are divided into two categories: peshat and midrash. Peshat is usually translated as the plain, simple or contextual meaning of the biblical text. Midrashic commentaries, on the other hand, sometimes play fast and loose with the rules of grammar or syntax, or ignore the immediate context of a particular biblical verse, in order to read an uplifting or edifying meaning into the verse.

At least for the last few centuries, few Jews have been willing to label their commentaries "midrash," and the distinction can be fuzzy. A common joke says: "Peshat is what I say, and midrash is what everyone else says."

Nevertheless, the distinction can be useful. For example, in last week's Torah portion, verse 24:7 of the book of Exodus reads: "Then he [Moses] took the book of the covenant and read it aloud to the people. And they said, 'All that the Lord has spoken, na'aseh v'nishma.'" These last two Hebrew words literally mean "We will do and we will hear" or "We will do and we will understand."

This catchphrase, "We will do and we will understand," underpins the writings of many Jewish thinkers over the last 1,500 years. Basing their thinking on the Babylonian Talmud's explanation in Shabbat 88a, they argue that the Torah is teaching us that the Jewish way is to perform various mitzvot (religious obligations) even if we do not (yet) understand the reason for these obligations. First you do, later you understand. This interpretation of na'aseh v'nishma is a good example of midrash, an educational message that is neatly, but perhaps artificially, attached to the words of the Bible.

Already in the Middle Ages, a few Jewish Bible interpreters suggested that the talmudic explanation was not the original meaning of the biblical phrase na'aseh v'nishma. The mitzvot of the Torah are generally divided into two categories: positive commandments (i.e. actions we are required to do, such as honouring parents or studying Torah) and negative commandments (i.e. actions we are supposed to refrain from doing, such as not murdering or not committing adultery). When the Jewish People at Mount Sinai said, "na'aseh v'nishma," "we will do and we will hear or listen," they were saying that they would do the positive things that require doing, and listen to, or obey, the negative restrictions that were placed on them. This latter interpretation falls into the category of peshat. Another example is the translation of the Jewish Publication Society, "All that the LORD has spoken we will faithfully do," where the two Hebrew verbs work together, in typical biblical style, to express one thought.

Since midrashim read messages that are meaningful to their own contemporaries into the biblical text, new generations often evolve their own midrashim. You might think, though, that the peshat, the plain, simple and contextual understanding of the Bible would quickly become a closed book. Brilliant Jews have tried over the centuries to find the peshat of the biblical text. Is there really more to say about it now?

Already in the 12th century, Rabbi Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam), the peshat Bible interpreter par excellence, realized that peshat, just like midrash, can and does change over time. In his commentary to Genesis 37:2, he quoted his famous grandfather, Rashi, as having spoken of ha-peshatot ha-mitchadeshim bechol yom, the peshat interpretations of the Bible that are newly thought of every day.

Peshat Isn't So Simple: Essays on Developing a Religious Methodology to Bible Study
Rabbi Hayyim Angel
Kodesh Press

In his aptly titled book, Peshat Isn't So Simple, Rabbi Hayyim Angel convincingly demonstrates that the pursuit of peshat is alive and well today. The book conveniently gathers into one volume 22 of his previously published short essays. Some of them analyze the peshat masters of yesteryear, but in most of them, he writes about more contemporary readings of the Bible.

Rabbi Angel, a young and prolific scholar, teaches Bible at Yeshiva University. His book exemplifies the high quality of new Bible commentaries coming out of modern Orthodox circles. For example, in the chapter, "The Tower of Babel: A Case Study in Combining Traditional and Academic Bible Methodologies," Rabbi Angel describes how Jews in previous generations related to the curious story of the tower of Babel (Genesis 11:1-9). He suggests how modern critical scholarship can help our understanding of this text, writing, "Over the past two centuries, scholarship has progressed significantly with the discovery of many artifacts and written documents from the Ancient Near East."

He then shows how various modern Orthodox scholars have benefited from these discoveries, and have developed new models for understanding the peshat of this perplexing ancient text. For example, a number of modern scholars believe that the Tower of Babel story is today best understood as a polemic against the ancient polytheistic society of the Babylonians. Archeologists tell us that Babylonian cities were often centred around temples whose high towers were seen as the work of the gods.

Anyone who is interested in the history of peshat interpretation, or who is drawn to this kind of modern interpretation, would benefit from Rabbi Angel's clear explanations. Rabbi Angel's ability to sift through the works of modern critical scholarship to find "kosher" nuggets will particularly appeal to traditional Jews who wish to discover newly invented peshat interpretations appropriate for our generation. ■

From soup to nuts for Purim

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Nuts, seeds and beans are customarily eaten on Purim. The Talmud and many biblical commentators explain that Queen Esther ate only these foods in the palace of King Achashverosh, because she had no access to kosher food. It is said that Esther made a friend of Hegai, the guardian of the king's harem, and received kindness from him, special gifts and delicacies. Since Esther was raised in the kosher home of Mordechai, she wanted to maintain her traditions, her health and her beauty by eating the kosher food she was accustomed to.

As well, Esther did not want to alert the king to her true religion, so she altered her diet. She asked Hegai to bring her a vegetarian diet consisting of vegetables, beans, nuts and seeds.

Three-cornered baked pastries are a great appetizer, and make a perfect midday snack or lunch item. After you have prepared them once, and see how easy they are to make, experiment with different fillings. Add your favourite vegetables, beans, nuts and spices to the fillings. The pockets are a healthy holiday option. Instead of being fried in oil, they are baked in the oven! This helps to save on calories while boosting our health.

Vegetarian Bean Soup

- ❑ 4 90-ml boxes vegetable stock
- ❑ 4 cups assorted dried beans
- ❑ 1 cup pearl barley
- ❑ 1 medium onion, peeled
- ❑ 1 carrot, diced
- ❑ 3 ribs of celery, diced
- ❑ 2 medium zucchini, diced
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste

Bring stock to a boil. Rinse beans in a strainer and drain. Add beans, barley and onion to pot. Cook over medium-low heat for two hours, stirring occasionally. Then add in remaining ingredients and continue to cook for one more hour. Freezes well.

Cashew Dip With Lemon And Parsley

This delicious dip is excellent to serve with three-cornered pockets or with raw vegetable crudités. Parsley and lemon are rich in antioxidants and vitamins, while the unsalted cashews are creamy and nutritious.

- ❑ 1 cup unsalted cashews
- ❑ 1 red pepper, seeded
- ❑ 1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil
- ❑ 1 cup fresh parsley leaves
- ❑ 1 garlic clove
- ❑ 1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
- ❑ 4 tbsp. water
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. pepper

Blend all the ingredients together. Refrigerate until needed.

Three-Cornered Piquant Purim Pockets

Dough

- ❑ 2 1/2 cups flour
- ❑ 2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
- ❑ 1 cup warm water
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ additional olive oil for brushing onto pastries

The dough can be prepared in advance, and is easy to make by hand. In a large bowl, mix the 2 tbsp. of olive oil into the flour until you can no longer see or feel the oil. In another bowl, mix the salt into the warm water, and pour the water gradually into the dough, kneading with your hands. Once the dough is kneaded well, set aside in a plastic bag or plastic wrap for 20 minutes, then knead again. Wrap the dough in plastic wrap and let it rest on a cool counter for 30 minutes.

Prepare filling (two suggestions are below, but you can create your own, using wild rice or eggplant with vegetables, for example).

Assembling the pastries: Roll the dough on parchment paper or on a rolling board dusted with flour. Cut rolled dough into 4-to 5-in. squares. Line your baking pan with parchment paper and lightly flour it. Preheat oven to 350. Fold each pastry into a triangle by touching opposite corners. Open it up and fill the middle of one side of the pastry triangle placing about 1 tablespoon of the *cold filling in the centre of one side. Fold pastry into a triangle. Using a bit of *glue, seal by painting glue along the edges and to enclose the stuffing, pinch the edges. Brush top lightly with olive oil. Once the pastries are assembled, bake at 350 for 12-15 minutes on one side, then flip over. Bake for 12-15 minutes on the other side. Pastries are done when they are golden in colour.

*Make sure the filling is cold. Using a hot filling will make the bottom layer of the pastry become soggy. Be careful to avoid adding too much liquid from the filling – try to make it as "dry" as possible.

*Glue: mix 2 tablespoons flour with 3 to 4 tablespoons warm water.

Bean Filling

- ❑ 4 tsp. ginger, finely chopped
- ❑ 2 cups chick peas, drained
- ❑ 1/2 cup dried cranberries
- ❑ 1 tbsp. ground cumin
- ❑ 1 tbsp. ground coriander
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. pepper
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1 tbsp. lime juice

Nut Filling

- ❑ 1/2 cup unsalted cashews, chopped
- ❑ 1/2 cup raisins
- ❑ 1/2 cup almonds, chopped
- ❑ 1/2 cup pepitas/pumpkin seeds, shelled
- ❑ 1 tsp. ground rosemary
- ❑ salt and pepper to taste

Mix ingredients together and spoon into pastry. ■

MARRIED WITH KIDS

Call the doctor. My ear hurts.

Lauren Kramer

I joke that my twin 12-year-olds had better marry doctors, but like most jokes, there's a serious undertone to this one. Marriage to someone in the business is the only way they'll get the medical attention they think they need.

My girls have a long litany of health complaints, a tiny percentage of which are legitimate. One, a gymnast, recently injured a finger during a back handspring. Tears of pain and full-on histrionics ensued over the next 48 hours, almost convincing us we needed a doctors' visit and possible X-rays to make sure there were no broken bones.

But luckily, my husband and I have had 12 years of practice in the arts of bullshit detection and attempted manipulation by children. Most of the time, we've learned to trust our gut and not rush to the emergency room every time there's a perceived crisis.

Maybe it's a twin thing, or perhaps it's just a preteen phenomenon, but it appears our kids need a lot of attention. When they think enough of it isn't coming their way, well, sometimes a health crisis leaps out at us, challenging us to our limits. Does she need a cup of tea, a cuddle and a little sympathy, or are we really required to wait this one out at the walk-in clinic? It's a question we often ask ourselves and each other.

I wish it weren't true, but the three doctors whose offices we frequent know us well. Inevitably the crisis strikes at 3 p.m. on Fridays, or worse, late Saturday afternoons. The girls have come to understand that there's one complaint that gets attention every time. When they come to me with ear pain, an ache a doctor once told me is "so painful you have absolutely no idea until you've experienced it," I think ear infection! Antibiotics! And we drop whatever we're doing and head straight to whichever of the three medical clinics happens to be open. Usually I'm spot on. A dosage is prescribed, my kid glugs back some pink liquid three times a day for a week or so, and the pain usually resolves quickly.

Recently, though, Twin B caught me off guard. The call came on my cellphone one Friday afternoon as I was driving her sibling home from school. "Come home quick, mom," she sobbed into the phone. "My ear is killing me!" Mentally, I dropped everything on my mind and started thinking fast. Which doctor was likely to be in the office? Where would the wait be the longest? And how was this phone call going to change our weekend plans?

I called my husband. "Quick! Find a doctor! Take her to the office! It's ear pain!" Obedient in times of crises, particularly when his wife is so certain there is an ear infection on hand, he swooped from work to home, grabbed Twin B and hauled her to the three clinics, stopping at the last one after the first two had no space. An hour later, they were still in the waiting room, our child tootling happily away at games on dad's iPhone. When finally they were seen, the doc took a 10-second look inside her ear, saw no infection and sent them home.

Twin B stormed into her room, mad as a hatter. "That doctor doesn't know what she's doing!" she yelled through her tears. "I'm in pain! Something's wrong! And everyone thinks I'm faking!" It was true. Though she'd been incredibly convincing, the doctor had offered medical proof that her ear was just fine. We'd been taken for a ride this time. My husband and I rallied together as our kid sobbed in her bedroom. "What is up with her?" we wondered.

It turned out she just needed some TLC. In time, I coaxed her from her bedroom to mine, where we snuggled under the covers and discussed the merits of the glossy pictures in a new coffee table book I'd just bought. I offered a small dose of ibuprofen (gratefully accepted), her dad brought her a steaming cup of mint tea to "help reduce the ear ache," and by the time bedtime rolled around, Twin B was singing softly to herself as she brushed her teeth. Ear ache? What ear ache!

They say parenting is the hardest job in the world, and it's so true. Most of the time, it's a guessing game, one in which you constantly second-guess your decisions. At times, you stand your ground, call a spade a spade and move forward with a semblance of confidence. But every so often, kids pull the wool over your eyes and remind you precisely how little you really know. ■

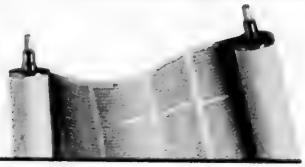
Terumah | Exodus 25:1 - 27:19



Maharat Abby Brown Scheier explains why the Ark was crafted out of wood, not metal
Rabbi Denise Handlarski highlights the importance of creating sacred communal spaces
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen says the success of the Jewish People depends on connection to God

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

When renovating or remodelling a home, where does one begin? Different contractors might offer different suggestions, but the Torah is clear about what should first be done when building the Tabernacle.

In Exodus 25, the Torah instructs that the first item to be fashioned is the Ark, which will hold the edut – the tablets or the whole Torah, which is a physical representation of God's teachings. Building this Ark first expresses the core value of the entire building project.

The construction of the Ark is notably different than that of the other holy furniture. The Torah states (Exodus 25:10): "They shall make an Ark of acacia wood." For the other accessories it says "And you shall." The command is in the singular. The Or Hachayyim (18th-century Morocco) explains that the Ark had to be made by everyone, since "the Torah can only be fulfilled by Israel as a whole. No single individual can perform all the precepts of the Torah."

As the most important piece of the Tabernacle, we might expect it to be made of the most precious materials. While it is true that gold covered the Ark, like a beautiful tapestry covers a Torah scroll, the ark itself was to be made of wood. Wood symbolizes life and growth, as opposed to an inert metal such as gold (beautiful as it may be). Only a material of growth and life was suitable to contain God's Torah.

We refer to the Torah as an etz chaim – a tree of life. The Torah is neither a museum piece to be admired from afar, nor is it an adornment whose primary function is to provide esthetic beauty. Our Tree of Life promotes growth and is a constant source of renewal for all who hold on to it. ■

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier is a Judaic Studies teacher in Montreal, where she lives with her husband and four daughters.

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

This parshah includes the precise details by which the people are to build a sanctuary/tabernacle for prayer. The context in Exodus is that the people have begun to receive the law but have not yet received the entire Torah. The building of the sanctuary is meant to physically resemble the ways in which the people are becoming a people.

The act of wandering signifies a search or a dislocation. But the precision with which the sacred structures must be built suggests something of permanence. As the people begin to centre their lives around ritual practice, they will shed that sense of dislocation. A physical centre becomes a spiritual way of centring oneself and one's community.

Space is a key issue for many of our congregations. Some of us continue to be "wandering Jews" in search of a location that works. Others have buildings that no longer serve our needs. Certainly any community is defined by more than its physical premises, but the type of space in which we meet influences our experience of our community. Our challenge is to find spaces that work for us while remembering that building community is an equally important project as building the spaces that house us.

This week's Torah portion also reminds us of the Jewish project of constructing artful spaces, complete with symbols such as the menorah, the bimah, the Ark, and decorative objects such as art and sculpture.

At the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, I love the wide array of Judaica and the reconstructed synagogues from around the world. We are a truly creative people that has designed and built beautiful things. It is our ongoing challenge to determine what kinds of spaces and objects feed us – as individuals and communities and, like those in the Torah, work together to build them. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski is assistant rabbi with Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto.

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

As we enter the month of Adar, my kids are excitedly choosing Purim costumes. My daughter is dressing up as a strawberry and my son as the high priest.

In the Book of Esther, Mordechai urges Queen Esther to beg the king to save the Jews from Haman's decree.

Esther agreed to go to the king, but only after the Jews, including herself, had fasted for three days and nights. This is surprising. The lives of all the Jews were at stake, and only she could save them. Approaching the king was punishable by death. Also, her pale face, as a result of fasting, would weaken her chance to find favour in the king's eyes.

Why was she not afraid to lose her charm by fasting and risk her possible success? The answer is that the success of the Jewish People depends on their connection to God to get God's blessing.

The Jews had it pretty good with Mordechai, their leader, being an adviser to the king. He also saved the king's life. Esther, a Jew, was the queen and the king loved her.

Yet an evil decree was issued against the Jews. Esther understood that this was not by chance, but was caused by the Jews attending the feast of Achashverosh.

We must do whatever we can and not rely on miracles, as Esther did. But her priority was to remove the cause of the decree. She knew that if the Jews repented, they would merit God's blessing and be successful.

In Canada, we have it pretty good, with a prime minister who has been good to us, and for this, we must be grateful. Let us remember that our success comes from being connected to Torah and mitzvot.

The theme of Purim is unity. We send foods and drink to our friends to promote unity. Through unity, may we merit to see Mordechai and Esther, once again, with Mashiach, in our days. ■

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen is rabbi of Ohalei Yoseph Yitzchak Congregation in Toronto.

Akiva Teddy MacLeod

For many, making aliyah can be an emotional, spiritual, momentous experience.

Akiva Teddy MacLeod may have had similar feelings about his move to Israel with his family from Toronto in 2013, but you might not know it reading about his experiences in his self-published book, Welcome Home: My first six months living in Israel.

"This is not a religious book, and it's not really a book about how to make aliyah or how to move to Israel, it's just about our experience as a family," said MacLeod, a 51-year-old, Ottawa-born former Catholic, who agreed to make his wife's dream come true by moving to Israel.

Speaking to The CJN about the circumstances that brought him to Israel and his decision to release a book about it, MacLeod explained that he met his wife, Tzivia (an occasional CJN correspondent), when he moved from Ottawa to Toronto for a work opportunity.

"I converted [to Judaism] before we got married about 11 years ago," he said, adding that they have four children.

"It's been my wife's dream to move here for like, forever. We both feel that it is a great environment for our family."

Shortly after settling in a town called Kiryat Shmuel near Haifa, MacLeod began updating his family and friends about how things were progressing via Facebook posts.

"I was putting up posts for my family in Ottawa and in Toronto and my friends. I was just trying to write positive things about Israel because Israel can be a scary place and my family thinks it is very dangerous here, so I was trying to... ease their concerns and try to show Israel as more of a mundane, normal place," he said.

In one example, MacLeod writes about trying to get some cash out of an ATM.

"I'm sitting outside a bank, high up on the mountainous city of Haifa, while Tzivia is inside trying to extract some money with her old Canadian debit card. Sure, she's probably not having the happiest time in the world, but I think I've got it worse," MacLeod writes.

"Twenty feet away from me is one of those buskers playing away on his cheesy, '60s sounding electric organ. While I don't mind the kitschy sound itself (in fact, I really enjoy it), the guy keeps playing the same tune, Spanish Flea, over and over and over again. I think it is the only song he knows how to play.

"That, in itself, would be fine and there would be no cause for madness, except for a few odd elements to his playing. So far, he has run through the same song about five times already and I keep waiting to hear the chorus to the song, which I am now convinced that he has no clue how it goes.

> I was just trying to write positive things about Israel because Israel can be a scary place and my family thinks it is very dangerous here, so I was trying to... ease their concerns

Whenever it is time to play the actual chorus, he bridges off into some Russian song, or sometimes I suspect he just makes up a few bars of something that could almost be The Girl From Ipanema, but not quite. Sheer madness."

MacLeod said that when he started to read back some of his Facebook posts some time later, he had an idea.

"A lot of the posts were funny, so I started highlighting some of the funny things that were going on and it became a really enjoyable read after a while. I was laughing at my own jokes and everything. That's where the idea for the book came from," he said.

In another excerpt, MacLeod details an encounter he has with a man on public transit.

"On one of our bus rides today, there was this older man ranting and raving at the top of his lungs at anyone near him. He looked right at me and yelled, for about 10 seconds, something Hebrew right in my face. I turned to Tzivia and asked what he was complaining about, figuring it might be about how crowded the new buses were."

"'He's insane,'" was her simple answer. Coincidentally, I learned a new Hebrew term just the day before that I've been wanting to use. It was the term "die," which translates as "enough," so I was itching to yell at the ranting guy "die, die, DIIIIEEEE!" (enough, enough, ENOUGH!!!), but I thought that might be a little harsh and maybe misunderstood by any English speakers nearby."

He said the book, released late last year and available on Amazon is more like an anecdotal diary.

"But I tried to make it broad enough that everyone can enjoy it."

Although his account of adjusting to a new life in Israel is light and humorous, MacLeod thinks his experiences could be helpful to someone who is thinking about making aliyah.

"I think it might ease their minds about making aliyah because it is a big step and if they read these stories, they may be able to relate."■

Jonathan Kay: Walrus editor discusses the media and Judaism

MICHAEL FRAIMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In January, Jonathan Kay officially took over as editor-in-chief of the Walrus, a national Canadian general-interest magazine. He comes to the position after 16 years as the National Post comment-pages editor, where he wrote on everything from North Korea to e-bikes and, regularly, Judaism and Middle-Eastern politics. The CJN sat down with Kay to better understand his stance on modern Canadian Judaism, and how he will carry that into his new position.

To start: do you consider yourself a Jewish journalist?

I consider myself a journalist who's strongly influenced by my Jewish background. When I look at the way a lot of Jewish writers write, there usually is some aspect of their background that comes out, and the dominant elements for me are cultural self-awareness and humour – that's important, because people who feel at least a slight bit as an outsider within their societies, usually, are better observers of those societies

You write a lot about Americans and religious extremists, sometimes together. Do you think being a Canadian Jew gives you a good vantage point to look at that subject?

I spent five years in the United States, which was enough to learn about the United States, but not enough to feel like I was an American. When I wrote my book about 9/11 conspiracy theories and political extremism in the States [Among the Truthers: A Journey Through America's Growing Conspiracist Underground], a lot of the stuff I was writing was stuff people just kind of take for granted. "Oh yeah, down the road there's a bunch of gun nuts who think Obama is trying to impose a UN dictatorship." And that claim has become sort of the right-wing political fabric of some parts of the United States, to the extent that a lot of Americans just ignore it; one of my advantages for this book, because I'm from Canada, was like, "Wait, this is weird. This is interesting. I want to interview these people."

I wrote an article about Jews in relation to some of these extremist movements, and one of the very interesting things is that, up until the late 20th century, Jews were often the target for political extremists. One thing that changed after 9/11 was that Muslims replaced Jews in a lot of conspiracy theories. And because Jews have a history of opposing Muslim extremism in the Middle East, Jews, for the first time in the history of the United States, were welcomed to the very heart of the political foreign policy in mainstream media.

"I consider myself a journalist who's strongly influenced by my Jewish background."

And you see this a little bit in Canada, too; sometimes I'll give a speech in a synagogue, and you'll get some middle-aged guy get up and start saying stuff about Muslims that really resembles the stuff people used to say about Jews, like, "These guys can't be assimilated in our fifth column." Jews used to worry about this kind of political rhetoric in their society, rightly, because they were often the target of it. And to a certain extent they're still the target of it. But I don't like to go to synagogues and see that kind of thing, or to see it in the comment section of a newspaper. I don't like to see it as part of the casual conversation. But now, unfortunately, you see it in the synagogues and you see it online, sometimes you see it out of the mouths of op-ed page writers and even on Sun News, where Jewish people, who should know better, have become the extremists.

You're talking about Ezra Levant.

I'm talking about Ezra Levant, but I'm also talking about the thousands of people [who] email me on behalf of Ezra Levant. And I hate to say it, but a lot of them happen to have Jewish names.

Do you think there's a global narrative about Israel that news outlets feel a need to conform to, with Palestinians as victims and Israelis as oppressors?

I think some of the vestiges of Marxism still exist in the way people think. People often divide the world between who's the good guy and who's the bad guy, and sometimes we make very arbitrary decisions. That's kind of the way we see foreign policy. There are a lot of things about Israeli society that conform to that narrative – Israel is rich, most of the people speak English, most of the people are white. So because those people look like our own society, we kind of assume they're colonialists.

Do you think it's possible for Jewish journalists to be impartial about Israel?

It's harder to be objective about Israel. Like, in my case, my parents took me to Israel when I was seven. And we went on the usual two-week tour, and I have very powerful memories. They took me to the border with Jordan, which, at the time, was a dangerous place. And they said, "This is where terrorists infiltrate." However, that said, intellectually self-aware people, regardless of their background, are capable of being objective. But as a Jew reporting on Israel, you have to try harder.

There is something we don't talk enough about in Jewish society: one of the things people love about Israel is it's high-tech, it's a wealthy society, it's well organized. The problem is, we now have a substantial proportion of ultra-Orthodox Jews who do not answer any of that description. When I see these communities, the way they treat women – to my mind, those people are no different from superstitious, misogynist Muslims or ultra-religious Christians. I don't think a lot of Jewish communities in the West have come to terms with what a threat this is to, on a superficial level, the Israeli brand, but on an existential level, the Jewish people. Montreal has a bit of that. I lived in Outremont, very close to where they were – they were really cut off from the outside world, and it disturbed me.

Western society was lethally aggressive in going after Catholic priests and the cover-ups within the Catholic Church, and I'd like to see some of that light shone on these ultra-Orthodox communities. The mainstream Jewish community should do a better job of bringing those to light.

But it's not really the mainstream Jewish community's job to start investigating these communities.

Well, right now, whenever I write articles about this subject, Jewish friends would send me emails, "Oh, write about the Muslims, don't write about this stuff!" And I say, "Doesn't this bug you?" And they say, "Yeah, it bugs us, but you shouldn't write about it." That, to me, is what I'd like to see change. I would like them to say, "You should especially write about this." This is our community we're talking about. Ultimately, my primary identity is as a Canadian. I was born Jewish, I acknowledge that I'm a Jew, but I'm primarily Canadian. I don't like practices that go against Canadian values. ■

Addressing the problem of farming in a shmittah year

Backstory

RABBI YIRMIYA MILEVSKY

If you are lucky enough to be in Israel this year, you will notice a few new signs displayed by fruit and vegetable vendors. Some notify consumers that the produce was grown by non-Jews. Others include Hebrew phrases like heter mechira or otzar beit din. The reason for these proclamations is that this year, according to the Hebrew calendar, is the sabbatical year – shmittah.

The concept of a year of rest for the land appears in Leviticus, where God says, "I will send you such a blessing in the sixth year that the land will yield enough for three years" (Leviticus 25:21). These extraordinary words of divine providence inspired generations of Jews in exile, who dreamed of one day returning to Israel. And by the end of the 19th century, the theoretical became practical: after a 2,000-year hiatus, Jewish farmers were once again growing crops in Israel.

The first shmittah of the modern era occurred in 1889, and Jewish farmers quickly turned to rabbinic authorities to learn how to deal with the issue. Many wondered how they could cease working the land for a whole year? They expressed in writing to the rabbis that if they did so, the few buyers of their goods would turn to others, and their loss will devastate the fragile new economy of the land.

Among the many rabbis who addressed the problem was the great sage Rabbi Yitzchak Elchanan Spektor of Kovno. The solution he suggested was to sell the land to a non-Jew, with the intention of buying it back after the shmittah year concluded. Technically, then, the Jewish farmers would not own the land for the year, and work and production could continue. But not all rabbis were comfortable with what came to be known as the heter mechir (literally "sale permit").

In 1909, as another shmittah approached, a new significant rabbi got involved in the issue. Rabbi Avraham Yitzchak Kook, who would later become the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel, approved the heter mechira and even encouraged farmers to sign the documents that would officially transfer the land out of Jewish hands.

But the zealots of the Old Yishuv (the Jewish community of Israel that predated the Zionist aliyah) passionately rejected Rabbi Kook's position. The most vigorous attack came from Rabbi Yaakov Dovid Wilovsky, recognized throughout the world as a great scholar after he published his annotations on the Jerusalem Talmud. Rabbi Wilovsky's scholarship, coupled with his fiery personality, helped convince the Union of Orthodox Rabbis to elect him chief rabbi of the Russian-American congregations in Chicago in 1909.

But Rabbi Wilovsky did not last long in the Windy City. He tried very hard to fight the dishonesty and corruption in the kosher meat industry, but did not succeed. Within a year he found a new home in the land of Israel. And when he heard of Rabbi Kook's promotion of heter mechira, Rabbi Wilovsky immediately went on the attack, noting that, historically, most rabbinic authorities never approved of the concept.

Predictably, the farmers who were attempting to work the land and produce during the shmittah year by implementing heter mechira, were upset at Rabbi Wilovsky and the Old Yishuv. They claimed that their lack of appreciation for people who were actually working for a living guided them to their position. They alleged that the only thing the Old Yishuv was interested in was fundraising opportunities. The farmers even tried to turn the tables, arguing that since members of the Old Yishuv were purchasing produce from Arab farmers they were, in the words of the Jewish farmers, "supporting the ones who are afflicting us in our ancestral land."

The debate between rabbis Wilovsky and Kook was fierce and bitter, and the residual effects of that tension can still be felt over a century later. As you enjoy the fruit of the Promised Land, it's worth being mindful of the challenges of the past that have shaped our present. ■

Rabbi says France needs Jews, as Paris shows its unfriendly side

Chief rabbi rejects PM's call

France's chief rabbi, Haim Korsia, rejected Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's recent call for European Jews to move to Israel. Speaking Feb. 19 in New York after a speech at a Manhattan shul, the rabbi said there has been a Jewish presence in France for 2,000 years and, echoing recent remarks by French Prime Minister Manuel Valls, that "France will no longer be France" if Jews left en masse. Rabbi Korsia also praised the French government's efforts on behalf of the Jewish community, noting that 10,500 soldiers are now guarding Jewish schools and synagogues. "We felt very alone for a long time," he said. "Now we feel together."

Walking while Jewish

An Israeli journalist who walked around Paris for hours wearing a kippah to test attitudes to Jews documented multiple threats and insults hurled at him and posted the video online. Zvika Klein, a reporter for the news site nrg.co.il and the Makor Rishon daily, released the footage Feb. 15 from an excursion earlier this month. Many incidents occurred in the heavily Muslim suburb of Sarcelles, Klein said. In one scene, a person in a black knit cap says "Jew" and walks beside Klein, who was being filmed secretly by a colleague. In another part of Paris, passers-by call out "Vive Palestine" at him. In several cases, locals hurl profanities at him, calling him a homosexual. The video, titled 10 Hours of Walking in Paris as a Jew, was inspired by a video last year showing a woman being harassed while walking in New York. Anti-Semitic incidents in France more than doubled in 2014 over the previous year, to a five-year-record of 851 reported instances.

Schabas' defence appalling

As a litigator with more than 38 years of experience, I am appalled at William Schabas' defence on the issue of bias ("William Schabas: No evidence of bias against Israel," Feb. 12).

A judge or the head of a tribunal must recuse from sitting if there is the slightest hint of possible bias or conflict of interest. In this case, Schabas had not only authored a paper on behalf of the PLO, a partner of Hamas, but he had also made outright previous statements indicating his views vis-a-vis one of the parties, the State of Israel. This is not bias?

Additionally, Schabas has an outright befuddled thought process. He accuses Irwin Cotler, Alan Dershowitz and Joseph Wieler of not being able to judge him because of their imputed bias as supporters of Israel. If this is the situation, how does Schabas not fare any better. His logic is totally illogical.

Affordable day schools

Given that we understand that the sustainability of Jewish life is very much dependent on Jewish education, and that this education is very much endangered by high costs, why have we given up the struggle to secure funding for Jewish day schools from the Ontario provincial government?

We seem to have given up, following John Tory's ignominious defeat for championing private religious school funding. But the reasonable arguments for public funding are every bit as strong as those against funding. In fact, Quebec is an example of a government that successfully funds some private ethnic day schools, including Jewish day schools. And that funding did not happen without significant efforts by the community. Key leaders of Montreal's Jewish community were pilloried for this effort by the media but were not deterred. Perhaps it's time that we return to that struggle and demonstrate how important Jewish day schools are to sustaining our community.

Iran seeks to destroy Israel

I am amazed at the twisted "facts" in the letter, "Iran is not the threat," (Feb. 12).

The main argument is that Iran has a geopolitical problem with the United States and Israel and simply "wants to be recognized as a major regional power." I agree that it does want to be recognized as such. However, its clear intention is to do it at the expense of destroying Israel and any U.S.-leaning country in the region. And while it is true that former president Mahmoud Ahmedinajad never said Iran seeks to "wipe Israel off the face of the map," he repeated that statement in order to fire up the crowd to not forget those words of the Ayatollah Khomeini and to continue on the path of the destruction of Israel.

As for the statement that "Iran, in contrast to Israel and the United States, has not invaded any country since the 1700s," I would like to hear why Iran regularly stages military parades where it likes to show off its shiny new Shahab 3 missiles (range 2,000 km) with the launchers marked "Death to Israel." What about the placards with a clear and unambiguous message in English saying "Destroy Israel and America!"? What about the Iranian missiles seized by Israel in 2014 while in transit to Hezbollah in Lebanon? What about the numerous weapons smuggled underground to Hamas? Let us not forget the various bodies of Iran Revolutionary Guards found among casualties in the various skirmishes with Hamas and Hezbollah? The proof of Iran's destructive intentions is limitless.

Iran is no paradise for Jews

The letter ("Iran is not the threat," Feb. 12) paints the most wonderful picture of Iran, especially for Jews.

I believe the letter writer lives in an alternative universe. The world I live in knows the dangers of Iran and its endless pursuit in the destruction of Israel.

It has been supplying Hezbollah and Hamas with arms, money and know-how in their war against Israel. I don't call that nationalism. I call that active aggression.

As for the Iranian Jewish community, they may be able to practise Judaism (within limits) in decaying synagogues (that they're not allowed to rebuild) and always in fear. This portrait of Iran is painted with a greatly distorted brush. ■

RABBI-2-RABBI

Standing up for Israel and the Diaspora

How do we connect with our homeland as a source of spiritual sustenance, rootedness and cultural pride while continuing to build vibrant Jewish communities around the world?

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Korobkin: I write this from my hotel room in Jerusalem, on our shul's annual Israel mission. We visited the Theodor Herzl museum and were reminded of the events that spurred Herzl, who was a completely secular Jew, to become the father of modern Zionism.

As a journalist in Vienna, Herzl was sent to France in 1894 to cover the Dreyfus affair, where a French officer of Jewish descent was accused and eventually convicted of treason. What Herzl discovered were demonstrations in the streets of Paris calling for "Death to the Jews!" This was Herzl's moment of epiphany, when he realized that in order for the Jewish People to be safe, they needed a homeland.

I couldn't help noting the irony of the events of the last few weeks, where demonstrations were once again being held in France with similar epithets against Jews, this time by France's large Islamic population. The accusation that Israel is somehow to blame for Islamic violence rang hollow.

Rabbi Grushcow: The lessons of the Dreyfus affair are sobering indeed. For the vast majority of our history, though, there have been significant Jewish diasporas. There have been incredibly dark moments, and hopeful ones as well, and in our experience in North America in particular, we have flourished.

Do we need a Jewish homeland to be safe in the world? Maybe so, but God willing, we will not always be in need of refuge. To me, the questions are as follows: how can we who live outside Israel help support it as the modern-day miracle that it is, recognizing both its realities and its ideals? How can we connect with it as a source of spiritual sustenance, historical rootedness and cultural pride? And how can we continue to build vibrant Jewish communities in the Diaspora, connecting with others and contributing to the societies in which we live?

Rabbi Korobkin: The Kabbalists tell us that in every Diaspora locale throughout history, the Jewish people glean "holy sparks" that are indigenous to those places and make them a part of our people. But the lesson of the Dreyfus Affair is that anti-Semitism needs no reason to rear its ugly head.

Those who suggest that "if only Israel would do this or that, they would hate us less," are deluding themselves. While we glean our holy sparks and share the light of Judaism with the rest of the world, we have every reason to stand tall and be proud of our homeland, Israel, and ignore the voices of hate that will continue no matter what we do or don't do.

Rabbi Grushcow: As we write this exchange, there has been more anti-Semitic violence: the shooting at a synagogue in Copenhagen and the desecration of hundreds of graves in France. You're right. People who are anti-Semitic will find any reason to justify unjustifiable acts. There have always been, and will always be, people who hate others in this world.

It seems to me that what is more important to talk about is how people can come together against all kinds of hatred. Of course these events affect us as Jews, but we are not the only ones. There are many old hatreds in this world, and each one of them affects everyone, not just the targeted group. Perhaps even more important, each one can only be effectively opposed by people coming together.

In that spirit, let me share the words of Father John Walsh, a colleague and friend here in Montreal. Sending an email to Jewish friends after these most recent attacks, he wrote: "The recent desecration of 300 graves in France and a gun attack on a synagogue in Denmark warrants a united voice that will in a strong and forthright manner condemn such acts as anti-Semitic and are not to be tolerated. The Jewish community does not stand alone in condemning such acts and your sisters and brothers of the Catholic faith feel the pain that is an inevitable consequence of terror. You are assured of our thoughts and prayers that these shameless acts cease now and into the future. May God bless and protect your communities throughout the world."

Amen to that. ■

As the JDL expands, questions linger

Back in July, the Jewish Defence League (JDL) announced plans to open new chapters in Montreal, Ottawa, Calgary and Vancouver (JDL's Canadian operations are based in Toronto).

In response, The CJN ran a cover story by contributor Ron Csillag that examined the extent to which the JDL is supported in this country, and asked: "Is the JDL filling a vacuum in Jewish advocacy, which has traditionally shunned street-level agitation? Does the group's resurgence reflect a hardening of attitudes in the Jewish community?"

As Csillag documented, response to the JDL's planned Canadian expansion has been decidedly mixed. During the summer, as the IDF fought in Gaza, Hamas rockets rained on Israel, anti-Semitism erupted in Europe and some worried that the same could happen here, there appeared to be more openness than previously to the JDL's aggressive persona. Meanwhile, others, including powerful community organizations, argued the JDL was taking advantage of headlines to scare Jews.

Last week, JDL leaders were in Montreal for the second time in half a year to recruit local members. As reporter Janice Arnold writes in this week's CJN, about 100 people attended an information session at a Montreal hotel, where JDL director Meir Weinstein received a standing ovation. Later, the group's co-ordinator in Ontario, Julius Suraski, announced the JDL has "a good core of supporters" in Montreal, and a local chapter will soon be established.

But if some Montrealers appear to be welcoming the JDL, the city's Jewish community institutions remain far less receptive. In a statement released just hours before the JDL meeting in Montreal, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) claimed, "The JDL is a small, marginal group that does not receive any substantial support within our community," and, "The Jewish community of Quebec categorically rejects the sensationalist tactics of the JDL and rejects its claim of ensuring the safety of Quebec Jews and their institutions."

Those statements are bolstered by Rabbi Boruch Perton in this week's CJN. In an op-ed, the rabbi of Beth Zion Congregation in the Montreal neighbourhood of Cote-St.-Luc, reveals he was once a member of the JDL. In the 1970s, Rabbi Perton writes, "I felt like I was part of something great and that I was protecting the Jewish Nation."

Over time, though, a more sinister side of the JDL began to emerge. As Rabbi Perton tells it, "It was not uncommon to hear the same words the greatest anti-Semites throughout the ages used toward us, but directed toward Arabs. 'Expulsion,' and even worse expressions, were a part of the JDL's vocabulary."

He concludes by encouraging Montreal's Jewish community "to send a very strong message to anyone who wishes to support and bring the JDL to Montreal… 'Don't set up shop here. Move along.'"

These are scary times for Jews, and the last thing any of us should be doing is burying our heads in the sand. We need to protect ourselves from our enemies – and if some worry that community institutions are not sufficiently prepared or up to the task, their questions should be taken seriously and their fear allayed. When that happens, perhaps there won't be any more need for clenched fists. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

Scandal leaves huge task ahead for Australian community

Josh Bornstein

In the last several weeks, the Royal Commission into Institutional Responses to Child Abuse in Australia has examined the response of the ultra-Orthodox Yeshiva Center in Melbourne and its counterpart in Sydney to cases of child sexual abuse. The commission has specifically attempted to investigate how the extensive offending by convicted pedophiles David Kramer, Daniel Hayman and David Cyprys in the 1980s and 1990s were dealt with by the rabbis and leaders of the yeshiva.

The commission has heard testimony from a number of victims of child sexual abuse within the organization. With one exception, all victims have chosen to remain anonymous.

The proceedings underline why Manny Waks, the founder of Tzedek, an Australian-based support and advocacy group for Jewish victims of child sexual abuse, was the first and only victim of child sexual abuse in the Australian Jewish community to go public. Waks displayed enormous courage then and continues to do so now. He and his family have paid a terrible price for seeking to ensure there is accountability for perpetrators and those who have tried to shield them.

The persecution and abuse directed at Waks and his family by some within the yeshiva community continued during the royal commission hearings.

A number of witnesses from the Yeshiva Center were compelled to give evidence. It made grim viewing. Rabbi Yosef Feldman said he did not think it was appropriate for victims to go to police if the offences took place decades prior and if the offender had since stopped offending. Rabbi Feldman also said he "did not know" it was a crime for an adult to touch a child's genitals. His father, also a rabbi, explained that he permitted a pedophile to flee the authorities by leaving Australia.

There was a smorgasbord of other evidence containing failing memories, obfuscation, abysmal governance procedures and dangerous beliefs about what constitutes child sexual abuse and what appropriate responses should be.

There were also expressions of regret and apologies – some more genuine than others. Rabbi Meir Shlomo Kluwgant, for example, stepped down as president of the Organization of Rabbis of Australasia. The commission heard that Rabbi Kluwgant sent a text message a week prior to resigning calling Zephaniah Waks, the father of Manny, a "lunatic" who had neglected his own children.

The royal commission has delivered at least two vital benefits to the Australian Jewish community. It has given victims of child sexual abuse a measure of justice by allowing them to give evidence, either publicly or privately. Secondly, the hearings have provided the only measure of accountability to date for those who have shielded criminals and persecuted their victims.

> Cultural change takes time and sustained effort

And there has been another breakthrough: the broader Jewish community is starting to speak up. In a statement, Vic Alhadeff of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ) condemned Rabbi Feldman's evidence in the strongest terms: "Yossi Feldman's statements are repugnant to Jewish values and to Judaism, which is centred on the sanctity and dignity of individual life, especially the life of a child," the ECAJ said.

The next step for the commission is to formulate its findings and any policy recommendations. In the meantime, there is an enormous task ahead for the Jewish community in Australia: cultural change.

Although the commission has focused its time and resources on examining the yeshiva, child abuse is not confined to it or to the ultra-Orthodox community. Tzedek has had contact with victims who have come from a range of backgrounds within the Jewish community.

Child sexual abuse occurs throughout society where abusers – almost entirely men – have access to innocent children. The current momentum to hold powerful organizational representatives in all Jewish organizations and schools to account to ensure this issue isn't swept under more carpets and that abusers are not shielded, must be maintained.

There is a need to address the archaic and, arguably, obsolete notion of mesira – a belief in some Jewish circles that going outside the Jewish community to address issues of concern, including crime, is a sin greater than the issue itself. It cannot and should not be used as an excuse to shield criminality from the authorities.

Are our rabbis and teachers sufficiently trained about child sexual abuse? The evidence suggests not. Crucially, there must be acknowledgment of what the data on child sexual abuse tells us: that the most unsafe place for some children is the family home. Clearly, more work needs to be done.

All Jewish organizations in Australia – and the world – are on notice. They all must genuinely commit to adopting accountable and transparent policies and procedures to ensure all children are safe and that all allegations of child sexual abuse are immediately reported to the police.

Still, cultural change takes time and sustained effort. We know that addressing child sexual abuse requires multiple strategies and the engagement of the different parts of the Jewish community. Tzedek is working to transform our culture so that those responsible for the safety and welfare of children respond swiftly and determinedly in accordance with the quality practices and guidelines.

The royal commission has made graphically clear that there are no excuses for shirking our responsibilities to protect vulnerable children. ■

'I smile because one day there won't need to be a Black History Month'

MOSHE MODEIRA
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Moshe Modeira

> I had to be given a dual education in the richness of my Jewish heritage alongside reminders of the responsibility that comes with being a black man

I'm the definition of the word "mutt," that lovable euphemism for a person who doesn't quite fit into any single ethnic category.

My mother is of North and East African descent. My father is of East African and Goan descent. They both have varying degrees of Arab lineage in them. There is a bit of Dutch on my mother's side, a bit of Portuguese on my father's side. True children of the world, between my mother and my late father (he passed away in 2012 of heart complications), they managed to learn to communicate in 20 languages collectively. My family could easily appear in some corny multiculturalism public service announcement. However, one attribute held my parents together more than their shared diversity – a proud and fervent adherence to the religion they both grew up in as children: Judaism.

Settling in North America later in their lives exposed them to a new and inescapable truth: the amount of melanin in their skin made them black. And in light of the murky post-colonial legacy still alive and well in today's America, that label came with some social realities that needed to be deliberately explored if we were to effectively navigate this new life in the West.

I was once asked as a teenager to write an essay describing my experience of being a "Jew of colour," and I likened it to being on a lonely island. "Too Jewish to be Black, too Black to be Jewish" I titled the paper cheekily, its rawness causing my English teacher to pull me aside and ask questions of burning curiosity before she quietly give me an A+ and treated me with kid gloves for the rest of the term. Perhaps she felt sorry for me. To this day I still get people asking "Oy, what's a day in your life like?"

The truth is, my life is great. I wouldn't trade it for anything else in the world. I simply had to be given a dual education in the richness of my Jewish heritage alongside reminders of the responsibility that comes with being a black man. I was exposed to the legacy of the American slave trade, while learning about Maimonides and Rabbi Gamaliel. I learned about Frederick Douglass one day, and the next day I would be versed in the Talmud and the Shulchan Aruch. I learned about the tragedy of Emmett Till, a black teenager who was murdered in 1955, and then we would light the candles for Chanukah and I would learn about Judah Maccabee. We learned about Martin Luther King and Malcolm X and Marcus Garvey while learning about David Ben-Gurion, Vladimir Jabotinsky and Theodor Herzl.

Like many Jewish families, we would get a solemn yearly crash course about the horrors of the Holocaust, and my mother would make the hairs on our necks stand up recanting her emotional visits to Auschwitz and Birkenau as a young woman living in Europe.

In the next breath, my father would recall his experiences as a curiosity in scholastic circles as his Jewish faith was questioned daily by colleagues eager to get him to take a stance and focus on one or the other. Black civil rights, or Jewish struggles with anti-Semitism. A plea for a better tomorrow for all minorities is always in vogue, but what about when those perspectives overlap? Should one struggle take a back seat to another? A black, Jewish, non-American perspective? This was uncomfortable for some. It didn't neatly fit certain narratives.

As an adult today, sure, I get double the heartache. My blood boils witnessing the plight of Jews just trying to live their lives while being callously murdered in the streets of Paris. I am outraged when I see black youths gunned down in the streets of Missouri or New York or Florida. I am in a constant state of incredulity when I see rockets falling on Sderot or Ashkelon, and yet the world continues to ignore the fact that Israel was forced to build an almost magical technology – the Iron Dome – simply to protect its citizens, as any country has a right to do. I am aghast that 2,000 Nigerians were slaughtered last month in what amounted to a footnote for most of the world media.

So what does a black Jew do to commemorate Black History Month?

I smile.

I smile because I know that we are another year closer to that amazing future when our children will laugh at us for the misguided divisiveness we all lived in once upon a time. I smile because the wheels are already in motion where we leave these chapters in the book of history far behind.

I smile, because I know one day, there won't need to be a Black History Month. ■

When it comes to war preparedness, we're not ready

Avrum Rosensweig

Every Jewish community should do an internal audit of how it responded to the needs of its members last summer during the war on Gaza, a.k.a. Operation Protective Edge. This is crucial, so that we in the Diaspora, like Israel, understand our strengths and weaknesses, and ensure greater preparedness.

The following is my own review of the Jewish community of Toronto's readiness. Each area is marked out of 10.

1) Public solidarity: A public expression of strength and unity is crucial during any war. Once again, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto organized an indoor event. The place was not filled. There was, indeed, an outdoor rally at Queen's Park that was well-attended and impressively organized by a grassroots group. The Jewish Defence League was, as always, present at many counter-demonstrations. As long as our mainstream organizations continue to hide from our adversaries, we will lag behind dozens of other Jewish communities who are bravely getting out there and showing our courage. Score: 4.

2) Hasbarah: The Jewish community was outnumbered greatly on Facebook, Twitter and other social media. While our enemies' numbers are much higher than ours, we are a bright community, and yet our hasbarah presence was underwhelming. The big question is where were the shul members, social action committees and Israel committees? Where were participants from Israel and Holocaust programming such as Birthright? Where were the youth? Where were the federation and Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs? It was difficult to find them when their leadership in this area was really required. Furthermore, it was frequently difficult to find solid representation from our community on television and radio when a decent sound bite was required. Score: 2.

3) Security: One of the issues that truly reflected our community's preparedness during the Gaza war was how safe did community members feel on a day-to-day basis. As our enemies become more strident and bold, cases of anti- Semitism are spreading on the streets of Toronto and on campus (and, really, across the nation). From my discussions and understanding, there was nothing available for community members who wanted to be accompanied to shul, or for students who felt uncomfortable on campus. Furthermore, not once was I, the CEO of a Jewish non-profit organization, contacted about our plan for our organizational security. We developed a plan for ourselves. Score: 2.

4) Reaching out to friends: I believe we fell terribly short in reaching out to other communities, and the public in general, for their help. Partnering with the non-Jewish community is crucial when Israel is at war. Many non-Jews were supportive of the Jewish community. Some even donned kippot during the war to show their friendship. Where were we? Score: 2

Every Jewish community must be introspective about its performance during a most challenging and stressful war. My sense was that many Jewish community members across the city felt terribly scared. They were looking for leadership, but little was offered.

Overall, I would give the Toronto Jewish community a 3 in its response to the war in Gaza. I care deeply about our community, but I can't muster a more generous score. I know there are pieces I have missed and perhaps was too strict in my marking, but to exaggerate our response adds to the problem.

I call upon the major organizations, together with synagogues and smaller non-profits, both Jewish and non-Jewish, to organize a comprehensive plan having to do with the issues stated above, should there be another war, God forbid. Not to do so reflects a weakness in leadership. It leaves our community, and others across Canada, hung out to dry. I call for an internal audit to fix this very big problem.

Life on the streets at -30 C is rough

Bernie Farber

His name is Gregory.

He's of indeterminate age – maybe in his 60s, maybe younger. It's very cold in downtown Toronto, so Gregory wears a ragged overcoat on top of two heavily patched sweaters, torn jeans, mismatched thin socks and mittens most people wouldn't wear on a cool spring day.

Skinny to a fault, with long unkempt grey hair and a scraggly beard, he's a common site at the northwest corner of Yonge and King streets, below the building where I work. He makes his bed over a subway grate for the bit of warmth it may produce. Gregory is one of the estimated 5,000 homeless people living outside this winter in the city.

His story isn't unusual. Gregory has mental health problems, which have made it nearly impossible for him to work and to understand the social welfare net, and, sadly, like so many others, he just gave up on it. Living on the streets became his only option.

Tragically, the situation is getting worse. During last month's cold spell, which dropped evening temperatures to -30 C with the wind chill, four homeless people were found frozen to death. As chair of the wonderful organization Ve'ahavta, the Jewish response to homelessness and poverty, I've become more acutely aware of our homeless tragedy in Toronto. We operate the "Mobile Jewish Response for the Homeless," where night after night, volunteers and staff drive the frozen streets providing food and drink, essential clothing, hygiene supplies and various referrals to self-improvement and counselling facilities to literally thousands of clients.

On a very cold February evening recently, with temperatures dipping to -20 C, I volunteered to ride in the Ve'ahavta mobile outreach van. It was a lesson in love and humanity that I won't soon forget.

That night was a roller-coaster of emotions. I saw despair, hope, strength, courage, love, loss, fear and life. Amit, the indomitable van driver, demonstrated what real love and compassion means. Travelling the streets where our "clients" live, Amit knew every spot they could be found. Our work was more than just handing out warm clothes and food, we spent hours simply talking to each of those we served. "People have a tendency to see the homeless as one large group of people with no name. It 'invisibilizes' them," Amit said.

Indeed, Amit helped me understand that each person had a story, a life, and that despite their present circumstances, each was due love, dignity and respect.

James was one of the younger men on the streets. He made his sleeping area in a large crevice under a bridge. During the day, he goes to the library to use the computer or to read. He's hoping to enter the Ve'ahavta learning program as a way off the streets.

Sebastian was brought up in Rosedale, but that night, he made his home in the hollow of a building entrance. He needed a warm pair of socks.

William set up his sleeping bag at Queen and John streets. An epileptic, he depends on his wife for care. They fought last week while at a rundown flop-house, and he was forbidden from returning there. We saw his wife Christine soon afterward. She has forgiven him and is worried he won't take his medication.

Before ending our shift, our distinctive van pulled into the St. Felix warming centre, a non-profit community house that helps look after people on the street. Nancy, one of the occupants who knows the van by sight, let the others know we have arrived. "The Jews are here! The Jews are here!" she shouted with love, not hate.

I couldn't get over how cold I was. I fear for those I met this night.

It's been more than a week since I last saw Gregory. When this happened before, he told me he had bad lungs. I'm worried about him. I keep hoping to see him tomorrow. ■

Israeli women wage peace

Rabbi Dow Marmur

In August 1976, a woman was walking with her three young children on a street in Belfast, Northern Ireland. Something that looked like an accident but was probably a terrorist attack killed the children and later led their mother to suicide. The spontaneous response was the women's peace movement, which may have laid the ground for what years later resulted in the Good Friday Accord that brought peace to the realm.

Last summer, three Israeli teenagers were murdered by Palestinian terrorists. The movement "Women Wage Peace" came into being even before their bodies were found.

The leading figures in Northern Ireland were the aunt of the victims, Mairead Corrigan and her friend Betty Williams. The outstanding personality in "Women Wage Peace" has been one of the mothers of the murdered teenagers, Rachel Frenkel. She even sought to bring comfort to the family of the Arab boy who was murdered by Jewish terrorists in apparent retaliation.

Avirama Golan, writing in the Israeli daily Ha'aretz last year, suggested that "the movement's name implies that a society that defines itself mostly through war has no choice but to fight just as ruthlessly for peace." She wrote that "only women, speaking by virtue of their status as mothers, could penetrate the barrier of anxiety and militaristic-nationalistic mobilization that washed over most of the Jewish public."

Members of "Women Wage Peace" stand at street corners urging passers-by to sign petitions and to support their efforts. My daughter-in-law, Sarah Bernstein, the mother of my Israeli grandchildren – two already army veterans, the third serving now – is among them. Some who stop to talk to her in the street respond favourably. Others are indifferent, skeptical and even hostile but, thank God, not violent.

It was worse in Northern Ireland. In addition to being subject to disbelief, the women were accused of serving the cause of the British occupiers, and on at least one occasion, stones were thrown at them when they marched. Yet they didn't give up, and their leaders were awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

The argument against their Israeli counterparts is, as it was in Northern Ireland, that only powerful politicians and seasoned diplomats can make peace. Street demonstrations are at best therapy for the organizers and sometimes, alas, also opportunities for troublemakers with agendas of their own.

It's also argued that women aren't necessarily better at making peace than men. Though two of the most recognized proponents of peace standing for the Knesset in next month's general election in Israel are Tzipi Livni, who has a distinguished record of negotiating with Palestinians, and Zahava Galon, the leader of Meretz, a party committed to ceding territories and making peace with the Palestinians, there are female candidates who hold different, even anti-peace, views.

The aim is to involve both women and men in the struggle for peace. In the words of the "Women Wage Peace" handout: "The last round of violence has made it clear to all that we must break out of the spiral. Whether left or right-wing, religious or secular, Arab or Jewish, we want to live in a society characterized by normality, prosperity and human rights."

Though many Jews around the world share these hopes, most seem to support Israeli political parties that haven't placed peace prominently on their election platforms. A list of wealthy Jews abroad who've made financial contributions, published in an Israeli paper recently, suggests that neither Livni nor Galon, but rather hardliners, are the main recipients.

Of course, everybody talks peace, irrespective of party affiliation, but only some are prepared to take the risks of trying to make it. They refrain from blaming the other side for intransigence and war-mongering.

It wasn't very different in Northern Ireland, yet in the end, the seeming naiveté of ordinary women and not the ostensible sophistication of seasoned politicians carried the day. The same must happen in Israel. The alternatives are too grim to contemplate. ■

New methods needed to keep memory of Shoah alive

Eli Pfefferkorn

A foul-weather friend who saw me through some hard times told me that the institution he worked for had undertaken a collaborative project with the March of Living organization. It was to be an intergenerational effort in which Jewish students would interview survivors in order to write an essay before embarking on the trip. Would I be willing to give an interview?

I'm openly reluctant to be interviewed. The interviews are usually pre-prepared and superficial. I pleaded interview weariness, but my friend would not let it go. He found a spot on my Achilles heel and shamelessly rubbed it until I surrendered.

My two interviewers arrived at Toronto's Lipa Green Centre, one equipped with a laptop, the other with an iPhone, and both holding a sheaf of sheets in their hands. A quick glance at the sheet listing the questions bore out my foreboding.

To save the evening from platitudes, I suggested that we reverse the order of the interview. I would go first and interview them, and they would follow by interviewing me. What I wanted to find out was whether they had signed up for the March because of peer pressure, "Auschwitz fashion," or some other adolescent whim. Their immediate responses were taken straight from the Holocausters' handbook, giving off a stale odour with tired slogans such as "Never again" and "We'll turn it around."

To get around the sloganeering, I looked for language that was familiar to their own experiences and yet hinted at concentration camp realities.

"One of the most devastating encounters in the camps was the disconnect between cause and effect," I said. "In your life, you take for granted that when you work hard on your essay, you expect a decent grade, and if you feel that you've been wronged, you have recourse to complain. This was not true in a concentration camp."

Citing a paragraph from my book The Muselmann at the Water Cooler, I meant to illustrate the inmate's helplessness to foresee the result of an action and calculate the consequences of his tormentor's reaction to his move, being prey to his rapacious mood.

This palpable description of life under siege elicited questions that flowed from the depth of the students' being, such as "How did you survive?" and "How did you feel after liberation?"

These two questions showed the inadequacy of the questions that they had been primed to ask, which were listed as "Suggested questions/topics: Details about their experience during the Shoah: Were they in a concentration camp? Were they a partisan in the forest? What was a typical day like?" In their formulation and tone, these questions conjure up a scene in which a mom greets her returning kid from summer camp with, "How was your day in camp?

And the counsellor, was she nice to you?"

After all these years, I can't help but wonder why March organizers have failed to develop a language that would resonate with young people and at once convey the darkness of that time. The only sensible explanation I could come up with was that its leaders settled into the comfort zone of "If it ain't broke why bother tinkering with it?"

Yet while it may not be "broke," its parts are visibly worn out by age.

The intergenerational project is nearing its inevitable end. Survivors are a dying species, but memory should be kept alive. This requires shaping a tradition in which each March of the Living becomes a milestone on the road of remembrance, in the Hebrew sense of masoret, of passing on memory.

In the aftermath of the destruction of the Second Temple, our sages created constructs and rituals that preserved the memory of the Second Temple for 2,000 years. Preserving the memory of the Shoah is doable. The intellectual and financial resources are available.

What is urgently needed is to think and act upon it. ■

The challenge of black-Jewish dialogue

Good things happen when communities work together, but is a new generation willing to continue the struggle?

RONA ARATO
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When protests erupted over Garth Drabinsky's production of the musical Show Boat, Karen Mock was among those who searched for ways to calm the waters. At the time, Mock, an educational psychologist specializing in human rights, hate crime and diversity issues and multicultural/anti-racist education, was the national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada.

"The minute I heard Show Boat was being produced in [Toronto], I knew there would be serious problems," she said. "It provided a good example of the importance of effective black-Jewish dialogue."

Morley Wolfe, a judge and human rights advocate and then-chair of the league's intercultural dialogue committee, agreed. "The production of Show Boat intensified the black-Jewish dialogue. Members of the black community were concerned about the people involved with the production. They feared that blacks would be stereotyped and negatively portrayed."

Wolfe invited his longtime friend, Arthur Downes, also a judge, and a man of colour, to work with him. "We already had an ongoing program with the Jamaican Society, so we invited them to a Passover lunch. I checkerboarded the tables so blacks and whites sat side by side. When they asked us, 'What's the program?' I replied that they were the program."

The result, he said, was an amazing afternoon of exchange of information and contacts.

"Show Boat was an explosive situation, and our dialogue program, co-chaired by Morley and Arthur, helped diffuse the tension," Mock said.

Mock began working with the League for Human Rights in 1989. She said that at the time, community groups were grappling with growing white supremacy issues. Organizations with vested interests in improving race relations were brought together under the auspices of the Ontario Race Relations Directorate to form Toronto Cares. In 1990, as a result of the relationships made in that program, members of the league, the community relations committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, the Jamaican Canadian Association and several other groups in the black community got together and created the Black/Jewish Dialogue.

That initial group met monthly, alternatively in black and Jewish community venues, and encouraged the leadership of both communities to learn more about each other, to share mutual concerns and work together to combat racism and anti-Semitism.

"Regretfully, that initial dialogue program waned, more because of challenges within each community, not between the two communities," Mock recalled. "But the relationships formed helped get us through the Show Boat controversy in 1993, until it was clear that the rise in worldwide anti-Semitism and anti-Israel activity had spilled over into the anti-racism movement, and we felt the strong need in 1999 to intensify the Black/Jewish Dialogue."

Once again, Wolfe and Downes, served as co-chairs, and a joint planning committee did a major re-launch of the Black/Jewish Dialogue during Black History Month in 2000.

"The program took place at the B'nai Brith building under the auspices of the League for Human Rights," Wolfe said. "We invited people from the black community to join us. We expected about 60, and 300 showed up!"

The first session included a presentation, a photo exhibit and a forum on the past, present and future relationships between blacks and Jews in Toronto, and called for them to unite in common cause. The intention was to remind both communities of the many positive changes made in the past when fought for together. Roundtable discussions were set up to encourage members of both communities to share and hear each other's stories and promote social and professional contacts. The program was the launch of Blacks and Jews in Dialogue, an ongoing group that met monthly, jointly staffed by Mock and Lorne Foster, currently with York University.

"Historically, Jews and blacks in Canada had worked together and helped bring in civil rights and anti-racism legislation," Mock said. "Jewish people worked side by side with people of colour at the forefront of the human rights movement, and we wanted the next generations to understand this, and not import tensions and hatred from elsewhere, thinking their histories were similar. We wanted to educate the students who needed to know that blacks and Jews had, and could, work together."

Zanana Akande, a high school principal, whose parents immigrated to Canada from the West Indies, was a participant in the dialogue. She brought her daughter, who was in university at the time.

"Our children hadn't experienced the kind of prejudice we had lived with. Jews and blacks had been thrown together by a shared rejection by the greater community and we wanted to show them that we had been supportive of each other in order to get through tough times," Mock said.

GTA students to participate in Kindness Week

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A wave of acts of kindness is sweeping across the GTA.

Some 7,000 students, including kids from six local Jewish day schools, will be participating in the second annual Human Kindness Project event, Kindness Week, to be held March 1 to 6.

The Human Kindness Project is a non-profit organization that provides educational programs to develop positive social skills, compassion, resiliency and leadership in children and young people to affect change through acts of deliberate kindness.

"Kindness Week gives teachers the resources to teach kindness, and students the opportunity to demonstrate kindness. Programs are aimed at students from kindergarten to Grade 12," said Modya Silver, founder of Kindness Week.

By participating, students will increase their knowledge of the positive impacts of kindness on themselves and those around them, and experience how giving leads to improved self-esteem and empathy.

There is no religious or political component to Kindness Week. Any school, youth group or camp can participate.

"Last year there were 31 participating schools. We're expecting to double that this year," Silver said. "So far, we have six Jewish day schools participating: Leo Baeck, Eitz Chaim, Netivot, CHAT, Tiferes Beis Yaakov and Robbins Hebrew Academy. In addition, the Beth Sholom Hebrew School and Jewish camps Shalom, Solelim and Moshava Ba'ir are also taking part."

Silver, a 53-year-old father of five who works in high-tech marketing, said the Human Kindness Project evolved from his own personal growth.

"I study at the school of Mussar, a Jewish movement that focuses on character strength development. For a year and a half, I worked on the trait of kindness, of chesed. I wanted to turn that into something bigger that could potentially make a difference in Toronto and across Canada by focusing on children and youth, giving them a platform to demonstrate what I believe is their innate kindness," Silver explained.

According to the Canadian Institutes of Health Research, one in three adolescents in Canada has been bullied, and one in two parents reports having a child who is a victim of bullying. As well, levels of stress, anxiety, and depression in children and youth are reaching epidemic proportions.

"Science shows that kindness can serve as a preventative measure... by giving students the tools to develop stronger social connections and a greater ability to deal with adversity," Silver said.

Students greeted 20,000 commuters in one hour at Union Station during last May's inaugural Kindness Week.

In exercising their "kindness muscle," students can go to a grocery store and help people carry bags out to the parking lot, write inspirational cards, or create a food drive, he added.

"A lot at the elementary level happens inside the school. The class will create their own homemade gratitude card and either give it to someone inside the school – a teacher or a principal – or in some classes they might walk to their nearest fire hall or ambulance station and give it to the emergency first respondents."

Silver, along with business partner Jessica Fowler and a volunteer team of 10, will be building awareness across the city during Kindness Week.

"While the thousands of students across the city are doing projects either in their schools or in the local neighbourhood, we are doing one awareness-building activity each day during Kindness Week," Silver said.

"We will take a bus load of kids to the airport and greet all the foreigners coming into the city, wish them well, let them know it's Kindness Week, and give them a treat. We will also give them a Kindness Week challenge card where they will have 24 hours to do an act of kindness and blog or post it with the hashtags #bkind and #kindnessweek," he added.

Partnering with the TTC, another activity will involve greeting commuters at three subway stations. "There will be a group of us chanting kindness slogans, while others are handing out goodies, all the while spreading awareness and kindness," Silver said.

So how can the kids keep kindness alive during the rest of the year?

"We have hired someone to design a kindness curriculum with lessons planned for grades 1 through 8 available to any of the schools that signed up for Kindness Week, who will get this material for free," he said.

"Ultimately, students who perform acts of kindness inspire greater kindness among their peers." ■

Israeli film aims to show 'human face of the IDF'

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Bnei Akiva leaders pose with Eden Adler.
ALI MARTELL PHOTOGRAPHY

Eden Adler is, in the most superficial sense, the picture of a soldier: handsome, strapping and eminently self-possessed.

The 22-year-old Israeli was, before completing his military service two months ago, a commander at the Israeli Defence Force (IDF)'s 101st Paratrooper Brigade basic training base, and therefore, at just 21, directly responsible for the safety and operations of 42 recruits and three sergeants.

But, as Adler stressed Feb. 19 to an audience of nearly 300 people invited by the youth movement Bnei Akiva of Toronto to watch a screening of a new documentary film featuring his and four fellow soldiers' experiences, "that was a nice movie in a nice theatre, with nice seats, and popcorn, but that's not a movie. That's my life."

The film, Beneath the Helmet: From High School to the Home Front, is a production of Jerusalem U, an Israeli non-profit that creates films and film-based educational programs with the stated goal of "making young Jews feel proud of being Jewish and emotionally connected to Israel."

It captures the trials and triumphs of four Israeli high school graduates and Adler, their commander, as they experience eight months of basic paratrooper training.

Bnei Akiva of Toronto organized a special screening of the movie, held at Empress Walk cinema.

Before the film, DJ Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general in Toronto, briefly addressed the audience, noting that, "As a graduate of the Bnei Aikva [movement], I certainly feel very at home in this community."

Schneeweiss explained that Jerusalem U produced Beneath the Helmet to make Israel more "accessible and intelligible to a contemporary audience," as well as to show the "human face of the IDF."

He emphasized the value of creating an emotional connection with Israeli soldiers, both for Jews in the Diaspora and non-Jews.

"There's no better time or place to show this film," he said. "So much that is told and written about the IDF is impersonal, and often there is a demonic representation of it. Movies like this are key... We need to fight the battle of ideas [in the international media] about Israel, but there's also nothing so compelling as seeing flesh and blood human stories of soldiers living everyday lives."

Beneath the Helmet focuses on five soldiers with diverse backgrounds and personal challenges.

Adler is the son of an American mother and a Yemenite father, raised in the Western Galilee town of Kfar Vradim. Though he's now confident and composed, the movie portrays how as an adolescent, he was quite troubled and struggled with learning disabilities – experiences that have shaped his ability to be an empathetic and effective leader.

Eilon Kohan, raised in Ashdod, is gregarious and fun-loving, and struggles to reconcile the rigours of the military with his free-spirited nature.

Mekonen Abeba is an immigrant from Ethiopia. A dedicated soldier, he must simultaneously contend with immense family stresses and financial difficulties.

Coral Amarani is from an affluent neighbourhood in Herzliya Pituach. Self-described as a formerly "spoiled child," the film shows how she blossoms as a drill sergeant at Michvei Alon, a pre-basic training program that helps soldiers from abroad integrate into the IDF.

Finally, Oren Giladi is from Switzerland, and must deal with the hardships of being a "lone soldier," unable to go home to family on weekends.

The film depicts the daily physical and emotional hardships – the exhaustion, fear, homesickness and self-doubt –endured by these soldiers, but also shows the enduring friendships that develop between them, and their growing sense of assuredness and pride about their mission to protect the State of Israel.

Adler, who spoke and took questions from the audience after the screening, said that travelling outside Israel after his military service and coming to understand the complexity of being Jewish in places such as Europe and North America, bolstered his decision to promote the film.

"I realized it's not too cool to be Jewish and in university [in North America]," he said. "I saw BDS, I saw Israeli Apartheid Week. A lot of kids don't have a tool to combat this. But after seeing the movie, I believe they have a tool. To get to know five soldiers and get a sense of who Israelis really are and who the Jewish people really are, that's a tool." ■

Sun TV's close lamented by pro-Israel groups

plungen@thecjn.ca

Sun News Network never acquired a mass audience comparable to established media outlets, but the now-defunct network "made a difference" and influenced the mainstream media's coverage of issues it would otherwise have ignored, said Ezra Levant, a former Sun host.

Sun TV tackled issues other news agencies avoided, was never afraid to mince words when it came to terrorism, and avoided kid-glove coverage of convicted terrorist Omar Khadr, he said.

Sun influenced the mainstream media, who realized "they couldn't get away with things... I think we lived rent free in the minds of the rest of the media," Levant said.

Sun TV ceased operations Feb. 13 after nearly four years in operation. Its supporters blamed the CRTC for failing to give the network the same public access enjoyed by its cable news competitors run by CBC and CTV.

Sun TV "made a difference. We had a small viewership, but our videos [online] went viral," Levant said.

In addition to reporting on the rise of Islamic extremism in Canada, Levant said Sun TV presented its viewers with more balanced coverage and analysis of the Arab-Israeli conflict, as well as the wider Middle East. No one else in Canadian television covered the 2014 New York Muslim Day Parade float that featured caged women, he added.

Sun also reported on the chants of "Heil Hitler" during a pro-Hamas rally in Calgary. Levant noted that a print journalist avoided reporting on the contents of the chant. Afterward, Sun questioned police and political officials on why they didn't lay charges against four pro-Hamas demonstrators who assaulted a half-dozen counter-demonstrators in broad daylight in the streets of Calgary. Charges were eventually laid.

Levant and other former Sun employees have launched TheRebel.media, an online venture that's covering the sort of issues tackled on Sun. One of its first items was a report on a Toronto imam who claims 9/11 and the Charlie Hebdo massacres were government plots that had nothing to do with Muslims.

Spokespeople for several Jewish groups lamented the loss of Sun TV, both for the coverage it gave to issues they found important, and because it signalled yet another diminishing of the news media landscape.

Mike Fegelman, executive director of Honest Reporting Canada, said Sun TV's reporting on terrorism, the spread of radical Islam, and "contextualizing Israel's security threats," will be missed.

Ezra Levant

Fegelman said "Sun TV produced critical coverage that the traditional media was afraid to touch upon," including local manifestations of radical Islam.

Sun TV provided "a counterbalance" to the news you'd see on CBC. "You'd see sources you'd never see on the CBC that present a conservative bent," he said.

Local Jewish organizations often appeared on Sun programs. "I fear you won't see pro-Israel Jewish organizations getting as much of a platform in the mainstream media," he added.

Martin Sampson, director of communications and marketing for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said "We had a very collegial relationship with many people at Sun TV."

He added: "I think the Canadian media landscape is poorer without Sun. I think what we want in a democracy is a whole array of voices and they gave voice to a particular part of the political spectrum – small 'c' conservative, the right."

CIJA was often called on to present its views on issues involving Israel and the rise of anti-Semitism in Europe, he said.

Jonathan Halevi was a frequent guest on Sun. A retired Israeli Defence Forces intelligence officer, he would update viewers on the support for terrorism in Canada and in the Middle East.

"Sun did a very good job covering radical Islam in Canada," he said. "That was a huge contribution to the public debate."

For his part, Halevi presented Sun viewers with videos and other evidence that there is local support for terrorism and radical Islam. These are openly available, he said, and let viewers to hear "what they were saying in their own words."

Halevi said the mainstream media doesn't adequately report on radical Islam in Canada and avoids "the big stories" Sun TV was more apt to cover.

Levant said when Sun TV folded, he lost "the best job of my life," but making the best of a difficult situation, he said TheRebel.media will step into the void left by Sun TV's departure to present Canadians with a conservative perspective on events. ■

Israeli minority students aim to disprove apartheid myth

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A handful of Canadian philanthropists partnering with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) are working with minorities in Israel to bring 12 young leaders to Toronto next month to help fight myths typically propagated during Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) on North American campuses.

The Connecting Leaders in Communities (CLIC) project was established to empower students and young adults to create meaningful relationships with Israel and Israelis, especially among non-Jews, and to promote democracy and shared values.

The 12 students who will be coming to Canada in March were selected from more than 200 candidates.

They come from minorities in Israel, including the Bedouin, Druze, Muslim, Circassian, Arab Christian and Jewish communities, and highlight Israel's multicultural society, with its diverse faces and backgrounds, said Shirin Ezekiel-Hayat, the director of CLIC in Israel.

In a telephone interview from Israel, she said there are two components to the training program: providing the CLIC students with information and knowledge on Israeli history, as well as its image and its challenges; and workshops to improve the students' public-speaking and presentation skills so that they can better share their personal stories.

Israeli students in the CLIC program celebrate together before leaving for Canada.

The 12 Israeli students will be visiting Canadian campuses from March 7 to March 14 during IAW in order to counter its messaging and that of the related boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement.

The Israeli students will take part in different events, including panels and class discussions on women's rights, diversity, innovation and more.

Ezekiel-Hayat said the purpose of the program is to "encourage students to engage others in conversations and to establish ongoing relationships with other student groups and enhance relationships."

She said several campus Hillels, as well as the Ashkenaz Festival and Stand With Us, will host the campus events.

Another key component of the CLIC program is to create meaningful meetings between non-Jewish young leaders and student groups in Israel, and to bring a select group of young leaders to Israel from different communities in Canada, including from East Asian, South Asian and Aboriginal communities.

The new leadership program was created to fight anti-Semitism by connecting young Israelis and Canadians, in order to advance advocacy efforts and create allies in non-Jewish communities.

Ezekiel-Hayat noted that recent events have led to a dramatic increase in anti-Semitism worldwide.

"Our goal is to cultivate a cadre of young Israeli and non-Jewish activists who through personal example and exceptional leadership will advance our vision for the future," she said.

"We need to make an effort to reach out to different groups and campuses and in the overall community, to create allies that will promote tolerance, democracy and stand up for shared values."

Judy Zelikovitz, CIJA's vice-president of university and local partner services, said CIJA understands the value of Canadian students meeting Israelis in Canada on their own campuses.

"Also the missions to Israel... make the CLIC program unique." ■

Seniors anxious for Wagman Centre pool to re-open

plungen@thecjn.ca

For a 90-year-old retiree, Murray Hoffman is pretty active, but not as active as he'd like to be.

Hoffman, like hundreds of other seniors, enjoys the water exercise programs offered in the salt-water pool at the Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre and Terraces of Baycrest Retirement Residence.

The trouble is, the pool has been out of commission since December and is not slated to re-open until April. And every year, the pool shuts down a couple of times a year for maintenance that usually last three or four weeks at a time.

Hoffman and his wife, Evelyn, live on their own, but they join many others from the Terrace and from outside to use the pool.

"We seniors depend on that place," Hoffman said. "It's hard for us to walk, and we can do our exercise in the pool. We depend on it. Our health depends on it."

Hoffman said it's taking too long to get the pool up and running again.

A water aerobics class at the Wagman Centre. The pool is under repair until mid-April.

According to Anna Ballon, director of the Terraces of Baycrest, there's a good reason repairs are taking so long.

To start with, the ceiling in the pool room requires repairs.

"Due to the exceptionally cold weather, Baycrest repair crews have been responding to urgent repairs on the main hospital campus related to pipe freezes and other cold-weather issues. Baycrest will make the pool room repairs a top priority as soon as the cold-weather emergency repairs to building infrastructure are completed," she stated.

In addition, she said, "the pool is closed three times a year for two weeks at a time for general maintenance.

"Baycrest apologizes to all those who depend on and enjoy the pool program. We appreciate everyone's patience while repairs are underway," Ballon said.

"The warm-water, salt-water pool... is an important part of the health and well-being of our members and residents.

"The pool was closed in December as part of a regularly scheduled maintenance inspection, which takes place three times a year. In the most recent inspection, it was determined that repairs are required to the pool area in order to continue to offer the water programs. We are addressing the work that is required and plan to re-open the pool in April.

"In the meantime, we have increased the complement of our other programs, and all members and residents are invited to attend an unlimited number of them until the pool re-opens."

Approximately 355 Wagman Centre members use the pool. ■

CJN writer one of three honorees at Cavalcade of Stars

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Cynthia Gasner, a longtime freelance journalist for The CJN, is one of three Jewish women being honoured with a "Women of Accomplishment" award at the 21st annual Cavalcade of Stars Evening of Jewish Music.

The event, held each year in support of the counter-missionary group Jews for Judaism, will take place March 22 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Gasner, 83, has been contributing news and feature stories to The CJN for 45 years and is known for her extensive involvement in the Jewish community.

Her contributions include working as director of information and public relations at the Kashruth Council of Canada, sitting on Baycrest's board of governors and working as a comptroller at the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto.

"I'm not that comfortable with publicity," Gasner admitted over the phone, in reference to the award. "I'm accustomed to writing about other people's accomplishments. That said, Jews for Judaism is an important cause and I'm glad to be involved."

Also being honoured is Toronto oncologist Dr. Ellen Warner, affiliate scientist at Sunnybrook Research Institute, known for her work on making annual MRI screenings standard practice for women genetically predisposed to breast cancer.

Radio personality and staunch Zionist Zelda Young, who has hosted the Jewish talk program The Zelda Young Show on 100.7 CHIN FM for more than 25 years, will also be honoured.

Proceeds from the Cavalcade of Stars, which last year raised more than $50,000 from ticket sales and donations, will help strengthen Jews for Judaism's educational, outreach and counselling activities, which have been established to counteract the efforts of cults and missionaries seeking to convert Jews.

The Cavalcade of Stars is the brainchild of Jerry Genesove and his wife Sandra, co-chairs of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's entertainment and cultural committee, who have co-ordinated the musical showcase for the past two decades.

"I was just a stripling of 63 when we started doing this," Genesove, 84, a retired schoolteacher, deadpanned. "My wife must've been about 23."

He paused for effect. "Well, that's not true. She is younger than me, but who isn't?"

Cynthia Gasner is one of three women being honoured at the March 22 event.

The evening will feature a showcase of musical talent from the community, as well as the presentation of the "Women of Accomplishment" awards.

Genesove noted that all three recipients were selected for their deep and diverse commitments to the Jewish community.

"So many people have told me Dr. Ellen Warner has saved their lives [when they were sick with cancer]," Genesove said. "Zelda Young is really dedicated and has been doing what she's been doing for many years... and Cynthia [Gasner] I've known personally for years. She always comes out to support the Jewish community, and she's very well-liked."

The 10 or so acts at the show will include singing from Shaarei Shomayim's Rabbi Noah Cheses; Cantor Zvi Katzman and "the Shaarei Shomayim Enthusiasts"; the synagogue's Rabbi Chaim Strauchler delivering "rabbinical humour"; and a performance by the Netivot HaTorah choir.

Genesove, who said most of the money raised comes from anonymous individual donors, has been fundraising over the telephone for months, with his wife keeping records.

They have already collected about $40,000, and are hoping, in the coming weeks, to surpass last year's $50,000.

"It's important to me," Genesove said. "When I was 17, I remember being at the Hadassah bazaar and someone coming up and telling me some missionary stuff. I remember I was shocked... These people take our Torah and turn it around so you'd think Christ was our messiah. They pervert it. That's why [Jews for Judaism] is a very important cause."

He emphasized the support of Shaarei Shomayim, which provides the Cavalcade of Stars with a venue each year.

The event begins at 6:30 p.m. Admission is $25 per person, $39 per couple. ■

ONE WHO SAVES A LIFE, SAVES AN ENTIRE WORLD

New Winnipeg pro-Israel group makes presence known

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

A recent appearance here by anti-Israel activist Jeff Halper highlighted the presence of a new player on the pro-Israel side in town.

Almost half of the 50 or so people who showed up at the Free Press Café for Halper's interview with Jewish Post & News publisher/editor Bernie Bellan were affiliated with the new Winnipeg Friends of Israel.

"We are a grassroots organization that was established by individuals who are passionate and care deeply about Israel" says Winnipeg Friends of Israel co-founder Yolanda Papini-Pollock. "Our organization is made up of various people from all walks of life, including people from several religious groups."

An Israeli-born teacher and documentary filmmaker who has lived in Winnipeg for the past 24 years, Papini-Pollock got the ball rolling on Winnipeg Friends of Israel last summer after the Gaza War.

"I was frustrated by the media bias, the coverage without context, the attempts to delegitimize Israel and deny our people the right of self-defence," she said. "Violent demonstrations, hate crimes, anti-Semitic comics, blood libels allegations and hostile media coverage were a daily event that led people to question whether Israel has the right to exist or defend herself against repeated terror attacks.

"During the Operation it became evident that we can no longer observe the matter as bystanders and watch a 'big lie' grow bigger without challenging it with dissemination of the truth. I started emailing friends and found that there were many others who shared my frustration."

The group held its first program at Papini-Pollock's home this past December. The guest speaker was Kasim Hafeez, who was at the time doing outreach and education programming for B'nai Brith locally. As reported last year in The CJN, Hafeez is a British-born Pakistani Muslim who switched from being virulently anti-Israel to supporting Zionism after reading Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz's The Case for Israel. Because of his understanding of Islam and the anti-Israel perspective, he is able to counter many myths and teach Israel advocates how to more effectively counter anti-Israel arguments.

Hafeez has now spoken three times to Winnipeg Friends of Israel at the homes of Bernie Bellan and Papini-Pollock, most recently on Feb. 24. Winnipeg Friends of Israel supporters also heard from Steve McDonald, associate director of communications for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), who came from Toronto to address the group.

In addition to these programs, the group has been encouraging supporters to buy Israeli products that are locally available. Members have also been monitoring local media for anti-Israel bias and advocating for Israel on social media.

"Our objectives are to proactively promote Israel during peaceful periods, to effectively defend Israel during times of war or when Israel is misrepresented in the media, disseminate true information about Israel thought mainstream media and expose the true Israel that we all love and admire," Papini-Pollock said.

Papini-Pollock said the organization has a Twitter account and a Facebook page, with more than 145 followers so far, and is working on developing a website. She said as many as 30 individuals have attended the speakers programs and interest is growing.

"We have been getting a lot of help from Shelley Faintuch [community relations director for Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and CIJA's associate director of local partner services] as well as support from Bridges for Peace [a Christian Zionist organization with branches across Canada]," Papini-Pollock said. "We are prepared to work with whoever wants to work with us."

Winnipeg Friends of Israel's next program will be an evening learning about minority groups in the Muslim world. The event will feature a presentation by a local Yazidi woman. The Yazidis are a minority group based in northwestern Iraq whose lands have fallen under the control of ISIS and whose people have been murdered in large numbers over the past few months. ■

American-Israeli critic of Israel makes pitch in Winnipeg

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

Anti-Israel academic Jeff Halper brought his message to Winnipeg earlier this month and was grilled by local newspaper editor Bernie Bellan in a question-and-answer session at a local venue.

Halper, an American-born Israeli academic who is noted as a virulent critic of Israel, is the co-founder and director of the Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions. Its mission is to challenge the Israeli policy of demolishing Palestinian homes in the West Bank and to organize Israelis, Palestinians and international volunteers to jointly rebuild demolished homes.

On Feb. 8 and 9, Halper brought his cross-Canada tour to Winnipeg, sponsored by Independent Jewish Voices.

His itinerary consisted of a presentation at a church on Feb. 8, sparsely attended talks at the University of Winnipeg and the University of Manitoba on Feb. 9, and, the highlight, a one-on-one live interview Feb. 9 in the evening with Bellan, editor and publisher of the Jewish Post & News at the Winnipeg Free Press Café downtown.

The café seats about 50, and just over half were filled by local supporters of Halper and the rest by supporters of Israel. While Bellan is pro-Israel, he is on record as encouraging a diverse number of voices to be heard and strongly believes in dialogue. He said that he tried in his questions to steer clear of Halper's favourite subject – Israeli demolitions of Palestinian homes.

Bellan posed a number of challenging questions to Halper. "Why," he asked, "do you focus solely on Israel when the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is just a small piece of the larger war with Islamic extremism?"

Halper responded by quoting U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry to the effect that solving the Israel-Palestinian conflict won't resolve all the issues in the Middle East, but it would remove a major irritant. He also referred to Israel as a European colonial society and mentioned Americans arm sales to Israel.

"I can't do much about the rest of the world," he said. "But, as an Israeli Jew, I will do what I can to bring about change in Israel."

Bellan asked him about the likelihood of there being a one-state or two-state solution to the conflict.

"The PLO recognized Israel in 1988, but Israel has consistently refused to recognize the Palestinians and wants to keep all of Judea and Samaria and Gaza," Halper said. "I have to conclude that the two-state solution is dead."

Bellan asked about the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement's boycott of Israeli universities and faculty, which Halper is on record as supporting, suggesting that Halper himself would be affected by it

"The boycott only applies to Israeli universities that are part of Israel's military-industrial complex," Halper replied. "Individual Israeli scholars aren't affected."

He went on at length about Israel violating Palestinians' human rights, with reference to reports by Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International, and he claimed that Israel ranks high on the U.S. State Department's list of countries that violate human rights.

He further accused Israel of wanting to hold on to the occupied territories in order to have testing grounds for Israeli-made weapons and said that Israel attacked Hamas in Gaza last summer so that it could show off its weapons systems to potential international buyers.

During the discussion, Halper praised Bellan for his willingness to provide a forum for both sides.

Following a question-and-answer session, Bellan expressed his satisfaction with the evening.

"I hope to see more such events where supporters and opponents of Israel can engage in respectful dialogue," he said. ■

YouTube parody offers religious take on Tinder

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

A still from Religious Tinder, which had more than 13,000 views as of last week.

The video begins with a stereotype of a religious Jew – payot, black hat and all – sitting next his bored, eye-rolling, nail-filing daughter, swiping through the eligible bachelors on Religious Tinder, trying to find a mensch, or "bubbie's wet dream" to marry his daughter.

"Rabbi? Lawyer? Butcher? Another rabbi?" the father enthusiastically offers.

"At Religious Tinder, we've simplified the arranged marriage process without losing the essentials," an actor explains in the parody video of the highly popular smartphone dating app Tinder.

"That's how we make wedding your child fit in the palm of your firm, but fair, hand."

The video, which is available on YouTube and has been viewed more than 13,000 times in about a week, is the brainchild of four Toronto-based Jewish friends, Adam Cohen, Nir Zahavi, Jeff Topol and Jon Corbin.

"The natural dichotomy between Tinder, the pre-eminent hook-up app on the market, and the restrictive world of modern Jewish Orthodoxy, was something I felt would make for a hilarious and creative endeavour," said Cohen, a 30-year-old comedy writer and producer.

Corbin who managed the post-production process through his production company, Corbin Visual, said, "I've seen a lot of parody videos online these days and knew that if we were going to throw our hat into the mix, it had to be a standout piece."

Cohen said he and Zahavi had been brainstorming ideas about the concept of videos that parody popular apps for a while. "We were looking for a twist we found interesting and engaging, and entertaining to people."

While Cohen and Topol wrote the piece, Zahavi funded it and Corbin handled post-production. This is the first video parody the four friends have worked on together, but Cohen said in the 2-½ years since he left his law career behind and dove head first into the comedy scene – much to the disappointment of his parents – he's worked on similar projects.

"I did a piece called Mother Russia, which was a musical parody of Russian homophobia right before Russia hosted the Olympics, and it got about 200,000 hits on YouTube and we got interviewed by the Global News morning show," Cohen said.

Cohen and his friends hope to use Religious Tinder as a springboard to create a comedy brand. "We came up with a whole bunch of different ideas," Cohen said, adding he hopes to produce other parodies that match apps with outdated traditions, such as, an Uber-like app for a private taxi service run by the Amish, and eBay for slave traders.

"We're thinking of branding it as modern apps but with a kind of sarcastic edge to it… edgier for sure, like an Instagram account devoted entirely to cannibalism. It's weird, kind of twisted stuff," he said.

"Religious Tinder is our initial foray into whether this concept can breathe and survive… We have these ideas, and we have an idea of where we want them to go, but at this point, we want to wait a little while longer to see what the response is to this piece."

So far, Cohen said the response has been largely positive, and he hasn't heard from people who were offended. "Personally I don't think it really crosses a line. I've done edgier stuff like Mother Russia and that got a whole lot of negative responses with the positive, and we continue to today. That was very controversial subject matter, whereas this is safer, more family-friendly." ■

Closing Ottawa's Jewish high school is a mistake

Faith-based education that ends at adolescence is ineffective in inculcating a commitment to one's tradition

Anne Vallely

What if the research is right? What if all our efforts to provide our children with a rich Jewish education during their elementary years are simply sowing the seeds for an adolescent rejection of their tradition?

This, it appears, is precisely what is happening. Kathryn Owens, a clinical supervisor at Jewish Family Services in Ottawa, spoke recently of rather disturbing research findings: faith-based education that ends when adolescence begins is profoundly ineffective in inculcating a commitment to one's tradition. Worse, it may ensure its rejection. In the subconscious mind of late adolescence, early faith-based education comes to be associated with SpongeBob and games of hide-and-seek – in other words, with all that one has out-grown.

I have taught world religion courses to thousands of university students over the past 11 years. In that time, I have encountered the paradox of which Owens spoke. Students who had early but unsustained exposure to their faith traditions (Jewish, Catholic, Hindu, etc.) were typically the weakest students, often cynical, disinterested, and usually profoundly ignorant not only of other traditions, but of their own as well. I often get to know these students more than their peers, since, near the end of term, they're the ones who come in to my office in droves to try to salvage failing grades.

By contrast, students who have had absolutely no prior religious education are often among those who do the best. Their interest in their own tradition emerges in the context of maturity, and is an expression of their own self-directed growth. They are eager to know more.

Owens explained that the adolescent mind should be thought of as "under construction." Adolescence is a time of tremendous growth in cognitive capacities, most pointedly in the areas of self-reflection and critical thinking. During this tumultuous and creative process, the stuff of childhood is up for grabs, to be retained or set aside. For whatever reason (and there are a great many intervening societal factors), the commitment to a faith-based tradition is commonly set aside – often forcefully.

Every culture institutes rites of passage at precisely this juncture because we know intuitively what modern psychology now confirms: adolescence represents a kind of "birth," a profound rupture with early life that needs to be honoured and handled with care.

Students who continue in faith-based education through their adolescent years go through the same process of transition as every other adolescent. But now they confront a tradition that bears little resemblance to the spinning of dreidels and performance of Purim theatrics for the delight of bubbies and zaides (all of which are precious and wonderful engagements for the young child).

Now they confront the full force of a grand, imposing and intellectually demanding tradition that has nourished among the most fertile minds known to humanity. And here, most crucially, they find their own intellectual queries and existential yearnings being asked and debated within their tradition. This is true every bit as much for the secular Jew as for the Orthodox. Jewish tradition's deep philosophical roots transcend sectarianism. Indeed, they speak directly to the human condition.

And that is why I believe the recent decision to close Ottawa's lone Jewish high school after this academic year is a profound mistake. The school provides an outstanding intellectual learning environment, one that's welcoming to the entire Jewish community. It is a place where students apply the same skills of critical thinking to every subject and where they excel academically (as evidenced by a surfeit of university scholarships).

To be sure, the high school is in a very precarious place, but as a vital limb of the Ottawa Jewish communal body, it is in need of healing, not amputation. Unfortunately, it has not yet received any. Instead, the high school has suffered neglect, treated as the orphan child.

The school's board has felt compelled to see the school close because it is not financially viable at current enrolment levels. But this is like a physician who, after reading the declining vital signs of a patient without ever administering oxygen, pronounces the patient's doom. The board's job is bigger than that of financial responsibility and requires a vision more expansive than that of an accountant.

Ottawa's Jewish high school needs healing. Let us try as a community to provide it with that. ■ Play vs. pray: Which twin has the better life?

JODIE SHUPAC

Larry, left, and Jeff Deverett

The event poster, featuring a playful split image of identical twins Jeff and Larry Deverett engaged in divergent activities – Jeff swinging a golf club, Larry davening at the Kotel, the caption underneath reading "Jeff plays, Larry prays" – belied the ultimate seriousness of a talk held Feb. 17 at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

The Toronto-born brothers, 53, were in town to promote their 2013 co-authored book, Play or Pray, which explores how, after Larry became a ba'al teshuvah at 30, their lives deviated radically. It also presents the twins' decades-long debate over who has the better life.

About 30 people came to hear the twins describe their upbringing, Larry's transition and their struggle to comprehend the other's life choices.

Despite the frequent banter and mutual ribbing one might expect from twins, the talk veered into weighty territory, as the men broached subjects such as the meaning of life, the existence of God and the afterlife. It was followed by a lively and, at times, charged audience question period.

Jeff, who currently lives a secular life in San Diego, and Larry, who lives observantly in Israel, began by recounting what they said was a happy childhood: Their family belonged to the Reform Temple Sinai Congregation, both had many friends, and they were good at sports.

They explained that they are mirror image twins, meaning they exhibit some mirror image traits: Larry is right-handed and has a dimple on his right cheek, while Jeff is left-handed and dimpled on the left. Each has a somewhat misshapen thumb on the opposite hand.

Strangely, Larry has four daughters, Jeff four sons. Jeff joked they might also have a "psychological mirror image feature."

"Basically, at 30, I drank the Kool-Aid," said Larry, who works in business and developed his faith after studying with the Orthodox organization Aish HaTorah.

"I became religious. My wife and I…We took on the Torah, Shabbat… Five years ago, we made aliyah."

Jeff works in film, lives with his wife and children in a home overlooking a golf course and, though he enjoys certain cultural aspects of Judaism and even sends his kids to Jewish day school, is agnostic and staunchly non-religious.

"Larry thinks my life is wasted. He feels bad for me," Jeff said. "He calls me a 'comfort-seeking Jew.'"

But Jeff thinks Larry is the real comfort-seeker. The leap of faith needed to believe in God, he argued, and a Jewish God, entails a fabrication or self-deception that helps one contend with the harsh uncertainties of being human.

"As a rational human being," Jeff said, "it doesn't make sense – a physical and non-physical being can never connect… I'll never truly know my purpose – where I came from or where I'm going [after I die]. [Larry] just made it up. That's more comfortable! It's uncomfortable not to know."

Larry countered that many things in life – evolution, nature – seem logical, but human beings have simply "gotten used to them," and that physicality and spirituality are intertwined.

"Yes, certain things we cannot know for sure," Larry said, "But we can get closer to them… We owe it to ourselves to find out."

In addition to arguing that his life has deeper meaning because of his relationship with God, Larry said Jews' assimilation and materialism is throwing the rest of the world "off base."

"There's more intermarriage and non-observance among Jews now, and that leads to the world going crazy, to things like ISIS," he said. "Jews are a light unto the nations. We're steering the ship for the rest of the world."

He added that Jeff's partial cultural observance of customs such as Shabbat doesn't suffice. "It's not about the food or the family – all that's really nice," Larry said. "But that's just the window dressing. Shabbat's not a vacation day. It's a taste [of divinity]."

Jeff said the Judaism he practises gives him a sense of community, though, ultimately, he would accept his kids intermarrying.

"You'd really be OK if Judaism didn't exist in your family in three generations?" Larry asked.

"Honestly, I'd be happy if, in three generations, religion didn't exist at all," Jeff replied.

Several audience members challenged Jeff on his claims that humans cannot prove God's existence, and one woman said Jeff's intimation that religious people aren't as broad-minded as secular insulted her.

The brothers concluded by embracing and insisting that, despite their differences, they love each other very much. ■

GUEST VOICE

The JDL is neither needed nor welcome in Montreal

Rabbi Boruch Perton

Like many Montrealers, I received an invitation recently to attend a meeting of the Montreal branch of the Jewish Defence League (JDL). Growing up in New York in the late '70s, I had a personal connection with the JDL. In fact, my synagogue's official youth group was the JDL.

We marched in parades in our signature fatigue pants, JDL fist T-shirts and cool-looking berets. We demonstrated for Soviet Jewry and chained ourselves to the Russian consulate chanting, "Every Jew a .22," referring to handguns and not passively ignoring the plight of fellow Jews.

We also learned self-defence and attended classes focusing on Jewish pride and identity. I felt like I was part of something great and that I was protecting the Jewish Nation every time I shouted, "Never Again!"

Several years later, I went to Israel and continued my connection with the JDL, meeting the group's founder, Rabbi Meir Kahane. Joining him for Shabbat meals and attending his weekly Torah studies classes, I was taken in by his charisma and dynamism. However, I also remember the encouragement to break laws and get arrested, because after all, "You're still a minor. How much trouble can you really get into anyway?" Thank God I never followed that advice.

I also recall the leadership, including Rabbi Kahane, spewing hatred: It was not uncommon to hear the same words the greatest anti-Semites throughout the ages used toward us, but directed toward Arabs. "Expulsion," and even worse expressions, were a part of the JDL's vocabulary.

Quebec is a very special and unique place. I am an individual who is here by choice. I moved here from Ottawa, and prior to living there, I lived in the United States. Over the years, I have been offered opportunities to return to the States, and each time I turned down positions because this is where, until I make aliyah, I choose to call home.

One of the greatest elements that make Quebec, and Montreal in particular, so special is that our society cultivates and fosters a sense of community with members of other cultures and faiths. Interfaith celebrations are common here. So are social settings that cultivate respect and appreciation for our diversity.

I just met with a young couple to plan their wedding, and they asked if I could co-officiate with their closest friend – an Islamic notary. The answer was yes, and I am looking forward to getting to know my new friend Karim better. What other province or state has a curriculum called "Ethics and Religious Culture," whose purpose is to educate our children about other faiths and cultures? We are a city that holds summer festivals celebrating our unique diversity. What a wonderful place to live and raise children who will appreciate others and be part of a broader world while understanding and valuing their own unique identity as Jews. I am proud to be a Montrealer.

> Our society cultivates and fosters a sense of community with members of other cultures and faiths

I denounce fundamentalism in every community – Jewish, Arab, Christian or any other group – and will speak out against it whenever I can. Any faith or group that preaches hatred instead of peace and building bridges needs to be condemned and has no place anywhere, and certainly not in our city. I applaud any group that teaches Jewish pride and how to stand up strong and proud as Jews and Zionists.

I abhor in the strongest manner possible any organization that in the guise of pride, teaches and instils racism and bigotry. The JDL does just that. While their message may sound convincing, it is no more than hate-mongering. I encourage the Jewish community to send a very strong message to anyone who wishes to support and bring the JDL to Montreal to say, "Don't set up shop here. Move along."

I am not putting my head in the sand.

The solution is never to become what we despise most. ■

JDL Canada, CIJA clash over Montreal expansion

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

The militant Jewish Defence League of Canada (JDL) came to Montreal to find recruits for its resistance against those it views as radical Islamists, but its first battle here is with the leadership of the Jewish community.

JDL director Meir Weinstein, who revived the controversial group in Toronto about six years ago, blasted the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) for its denunciation of the JDL's attempt to form a Montreal chapter.

Before about 100 people on Feb. 16 at Ruby Foo's Hotel, Weinstein called it a "disgrace" that CIJA would speak against the JDL. He said CIJA's main spokesperson on the issue, Rabbi Reuben Poupko, is "two-faced," because Weinstein alleged he used to be a JDL supporter.

(Rabbi Poupko responded to The CJN, "I question the premise that one's views in 1981 are relevant to this discussion.")

He was referring to a CIJA statement issued a few hours before the meeting in which Rabbi Poupko, a CIJA board member, is quoted as saying: "The Jewish community of Quebec categorically rejects the sensationalist tactics of the JDL and rejects its claim of ensuring the safety of Quebec Jews and their institutions.

"The JDL is a small, marginal group that does not receive any substantial support within our community. By claiming that Jews need a rapid response team to anti-Semitic threats, the JDL is irresponsibly contributing to the creation of a climate of fear within the Jewish community."

Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre also tweeted that the group is not welcome nor needed in Montreal.

Those who attended the widely publicized meeting – the second attempt by the JDL in six months to set up a chapter in Montreal – appeared to be supportive of Weinstein's message that Jews are at risk and the established community is not doing enough to protect them.

Many in the mostly middle-aged and older crowd gave Weinstein a standing ovation when he "pledged never again will we turn a blind eye and place our faith in false leadership."

The evening was without incident. About a dozen JDL "marshals," burly young men in black jackets emblazoned with "never again" and clenched fist on a yellow star logo, with bullet-proof vests underneath, patrolled the venue.

Both Weinstein and Julius Suraski, the JDL's co-ordinator for Ontario, described themselves as sons of Holocaust survivors and several times invoked the Holocaust while painting a dire picture of the peril Jews face today. Muslim extremists want to kill Jews, they said, and Jews have to know how to defend themselves physically.

However, they stressed that JDL members

Jewish Defence League of Canada director Meir Weinstein, right, speaks with audience members after Montreal meeting.

aren't vigilantes and don't carry guns or other weapons. They say they're law-abiding and work with police and government, monitoring and infiltrating groups that they deem a danger to Jews.

(This was backed up by CIJA, which stated that the JDL in Canada has "never committed any criminal or violent act, nor has it been accused of inciting hatred.")

Suraski noted that he is active with the federal Conservative Party, heads his riding association, and was a member of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's delegation on his official visit to Israel last year.

Nevertheless, Weinstein said, "We have to be on the street and show we are not afraid of the bullies."

Weinstein, who first became involved with the JDL in 1979, expressed admiration for its American founder, the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, whose extremist Kach Party was banned from Israel's Knesset, for his "use of violence to make Soviet Jewish emigration a page 1 issue."

He also has no regrets about his past. "In the 1980s, when the neo-Nazis tried to attack me or other Jews, I'm not ashamed to say that we smashed them," Weinstein said.

One audience member, who described himself as "on the fence" about the JDL, asked Weinstein about Israeli Baruch Goldstein's murder of 29 Palestinians in 1994. Goldstein was a onetime member of the JDL.

Weinstein said he would have stopped Goldstein if he had known ahead of time. "But you have to understand the context: Goldstein was a doctor who was saving Jews and Arabs, who saw mobs massacring Jews, who was held back by mobs from treating them. He lost it."

Suraski said the JDL now has "a good core of supporters" in Montreal and will establish a chapter, with details of its activities to be made known soon. It's also trying to form chapters in Ottawa, Calgary and Vancouver.

Jack Kincler, chair of the independent Canadian Institute for Jewish Research, told The CJN he did not think his organization could work with the JDL, but added: "We need both. We complement each other. We are more academic, and they are more action-oriented."

Another well-known community member, Evelyn Bloomfield Schachter, was unreserved in her support for the JDL.

"The community's sha shtil ["be quiet" policy] is not working. We need to defend ourselves," she said.

Similar views were voiced by others.

Lisa Benhaim, a signed-up Montreal member who used to live in Toronto, said she is impressed by how the JDL behaves at pro-Islamist rallies there. "My daughter was at Concordia [University] for three years, and she was afraid to wear a Jewish symbol. Something is wrong here. Our youth need to be ready, to be educated."

She believes many Montreal Jews "secretly" support the JDL.

As Weinstein and Suraski noted, the JDL works with other faith groups – Christians, Hindus and even Muslims, of whom they named a few.

Two non-Jewish friends in attendance were introduced: André Drouin, a councillor of the small Mauricie town of Hérouxville, who authored the 2007 "code of conduct" for immigrants, targeting supposed Muslim and other minority religion practices, which made international news; and Valerie Price, a local leader of Act! for Canada, a group that warns Islamism threatens democratic values.

Price said she has admired the JDL since members drove in from Toronto to join a demonstration outside Huntingdon town hall against its mayor, Stéphane Gendron, for his anti-Israel remarks in 2012.

The last word went to artist Haim Sherff, who said he had been an Israeli air force member: "Your group is absolutely necessary. There is no need for us to be sheep for the slaughter any more." ■

El Paso rabbi to tell the story of hidden Jews

plungen@thecjn.ca

The story of the expulsion of Spanish Jews is pretty well known. In 1492, after about 100 years of persecution and forced conversions, King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella ordered the Jews of Spain to leave.

An estimated 200,000 departed but tens of thousands of others remained as Christian converts.

One study, which has been disputed, suggested that nearly 20 per cent of the people in Spain and Portugal possess DNA reflecting a Sephardi Jewish heritage.

Many of those who remained practiced Judaism in secret – the so-called crypto-Jews (or hidden Jews). Some departed for the new world, heading for border areas where they would be far from those who would look too closely as to how they lived their lives.

That's where Rabbi Stephen Leon comes into this story. In 1986, Rabbi Leon, a native of Brooklyn, N.Y., moved to the west Texas city of El Paso, across the border from Juarez, Mexico. Within days, he experienced three incidents in succession that led him to further study the fate of crypto-Jews, also known as anusim, the Hebrew word for "forced ones."

Rabbi Leon will tell the story of hidden Jews in an address at Congregation Darchei Noam on March 9.

Shortly after his arrival in El Paso, Rabbi Leon received a phone call from a Mexican Catholic man in Juarez who had some questions for him.

They met at his synagogue, and this is the story Rabbi Leon tells. The man's grandmother had just died. Together they had shared a ritual every Friday night ever since he was a little boy. His grandmother would take him to a room in private, light two candles and say some prayers in a language he didn't understand. Then they would rejoin the rest of the family for dinner.

When he mentioned the weekly ritual to his family, they didn't want to talk about it, though they referred him to a local priest for an answer. The priest told him that hundreds of Catholic women in Juarez perform the same ritual, but he should see a rabbi to explain it.

So he asked the rabbi, "What does this mean?"

It's actually a Jewish custom, the rabbi explained.

When he heard that, "I thought he was going to fall off his chair," Rabbi Leon said.

The fellow had grown up as a Catholic with no idea what a rabbi was, let alone what the Spanish Inquisition or the Spanish expulsion were.

The Juarez incident was the first of three in succession that led the rabbi to an interest in anusim. The spiritual leader at Congregation B'nai Zion, a Conservative synagogue, he's also known as rabbi for the crypto-Jews of the southwestern United States.

Over the years, more anusim have come

Rabbi Stephen Leon in his office forward, reclaiming their heritage, while at the same time, there has been outreach toward them.

Rabbi Leon cites Rabbi Juan Mejia, who hails from Bogota but now lives in Oklahoma City, as a descendant of anusim who has assisted others in Latin America reclaim their past and convert to Judaism.

Rabbi Mejia studied in Jerusalem and is the first descendant of anusim to be ordained as a rabbi. He regularly visits communities in South America, Spain and Mexico, advising crypto-Jews about their heritage and how to return to the Jewish fold.

The Internet and social media are useful tools in keeping in touch with anusim, and they're used by anusim to find more materials to help them connect to Judaism, Rabbi Leon said.

For his part, Rabbi Leon was instrumental in organizing the Sephardic-Hispanic Anousim Learning Center in El Paso, and he collaborates with Sonya Loyo, a returned Jew, in the annual Sephardic Anousim Conference.

Rabbi Leon has converted 60 families to Judaism through the beit din he operates, but he acknowledges that many anusim bristle at the requirement that they convert. He can understand why.

"Do they have to convert to something that was stolen from them?" he said.

So how many anusim are there?

There is no definitive answer, he said. The exact number of Jews who were lost to Judaism – either expelled, converted or killed – is estimated to range from 200,000 to 800,000. (Other sources put the number who converted at close to 50,000.) If you take a middle number, say 300,000 to 400,000 and extrapolate from 1492 to today, there might have been 100 million Jews alive today, he suggested.

It's all very speculative, Rabbi Leon acknowledged. But Latinos are a fast-growing population, which means there are many potential Jews out there, he said.

Even for those interested in rejoining the Jewish People, many constraints arise.

"People have had difficulty being accepted by the Jewish community and they face rejection by their Catholic families." They've been told they will go to hell, Rabbi Leon said.

Still, 500 years of tenacity are difficult to ignore. The first fellow he met, the man from Juarez, attends Yom Kippur services at his shul every year.

But he comes alone. ■

Jews and blacks have led anti-racism efforts in past

After the initial Black History Month launch, on June 5, 2000, about 60 participants who wanted an ongoing program attended the second meeting of the Black/Jewish Dialogue and Action Group, facilitated by Carol Tator and Hamlin Grange. The goal was to set up and prioritize initiatives to pursue over the coming year. They were divided into six tables, and each set up a list of goals. These included developing a program designed to heal tensions between the black and Jewish communities, organize a youth forum and engage in outreach educational programs, and develop a resource pool.

According to Downes, the goal was to "open channels of dialogue and discuss in a forthright manner areas of mutual concern." Those areas, he said, covered topics as diverse as dating and employment.

"It was about respecting other people's cultural traditions. What we accomplished was learning how to speak to each other. It educated all of us," he said. "For example, I quite often advocate for Jews when there aren't any in the room."

Mock said the urgency for dialogue and joint action programs had increased because the Mike Harris government had eliminated the anti-racism divisions of the Ministry of Citizenship and Culture, and of the Ministry of Education. "The non-government organizations (NGOs) took over. We did leadership development to equip people to deal with situations as they arose. Our efforts ultimately helped bring in further anti-racism and equity strategies for the province by keeping the issues alive."

The group produced a manual documenting the history of blacks and Jews in Canada and offering suggestions and strategies for programming. One of those programs was a Passover seder titled "From Oppression to Freedom: Our Shared Experience and Vision," in which the black and Jewish participants shared

> What we accomplished was learning how to speak to each other the Passover experience and their common historical links to slavery.

Although the formal Blacks and Jews in Dialogue group has been discontinued, there are attempts from time to time to keep the conversation going. More recently, a play titled The Black-Jew Dialogues has been presenting similar themes. The play, which was written to stimulate discussion about race and diversity, was performed at Ryerson University in February 2012. The two-actor play explores the absurdity of prejudice and racism and the power of diversity. The program combines fast-paced sketches, improvisations, multi-media, puppets, a game show and a post-show discussion.

Mitch Reiss is a student at Ryerson who helped bring the show, which originated in Boston, to Toronto. The show was sponsored by Hillel, the Caribbean Students' Association and the United Black Students Association. The performance was open to the public.

"The community was very responsive," Reiss said. "All the groups came together to talk about stereotypes. For the groups involved, it created a better commonality in the micro sense. It opened up conversations."

Mock points out that Jewish people working side by side with people of colour have historically been at the forefront of the human rights and anti-racism movement in Canada and the United States. "One hopes," she adds, "that the new generation will continue the struggle – together." ■

David Cohen becomes CIA No. 2

RON KAMPEAS
JTA, WASHINGTON, D.C.

David Cohen's path to second in command at the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency is, in many respects, a typical one in Washington, D.C.

A seasoned Ivy League lawyer who began his career defending the right of religious groups to display menorahs on government property, Cohen was the Obama administration's top Iran sanctions official as the Treasury Department's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

But in other respects, the 51-year-old Cohen's ascent to deputy director is less typical. A number of Jews have long alleged they hit speed bumps in the U.S. security services, their careers in some cases temporarily obstructed over security clearance questions. For others, accusations of espionage based on ties to Israel, however remote, have driven them from their jobs following home raids and round-the-clock surveillance.

Two federal employees – Adam Ciralsky, a CIA lawyer who was investigated in 1999, and David Tenenbaum, a civilian army engineer whose home was raided by the FBI in 1997 – uncovered evidence they were targeted because they're Jewish.

Ciralsky learned his distant relationship to Israel's first and long dead president, Chaim Weizmann, and the fact his father had purchased Israel Bonds were held against him. Tenenbaum was deemed suspicious in part because he spoke Hebrew, even though it was helpful in performing his official duties as a liaison to Israeli counterparts.

Ciralsky and Tenenbaum each filed suit against their respective agencies, both of which ultimately admitted the men were victims of religious discrimination. Ciralsky quietly dropped his case in 2012. Tenenbaum's case is ongoing.

Jewish leaders said those incidents, along with the most notorious case of a Jewish government career run aground – the Navy intelligence analyst Jonathan Pollard, who was sentenced to life imprisonment in 1987 for passing state secrets to Israel – are now fading from memory. In their wake, they said, the outlook for Jews at the highest levels of the U.S. security apparatus are improving.

Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, said complaints to his organization of bias against Jews in government have diminished nearly to zero in recent years.

"The problem related to Pollard and the stereotype of dual loyalty," said Foxman, whose group until two years ago provided diversity training to the CIA. "I would say we have mostly overcome the residual issue of trust of Jews in intelligence issues."

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, called Cohen "one of the heroes" of the effort to pressure Iran economically over its nuclear program and said his appointment shows the government is sensitive to cases of past bias.

Jewish-Americans have been working in American intelligence since the days of the CIA's predecessor, the World War II-era Office of Strategic Services. Their skills were in demand in part because so many were recent immigrants, or were the children of immigrants, and were familiar with European languages and customs.

Some Jewish agents enjoyed long careers in U.S. security agencies with nary a hiccup. A smaller number have risen to its upper echelons. John Deutsch served as CIA director for 17 months in 1995-96, the second Jew to hold that position. James Schlesinger, who was born Jewish but converted to Christianity as an adult, was CIA director for several months in 1973. Another David Cohen was deputy director of operations in the 1990s.

The number of Jewish security personnel who have hit roadblocks isn't clear. Lawyers who represent security personnel denied the clearance necessary for advancement say they've fielded dozens of complaints from Jews.

Sheldon Cohen, a lawyer who handles such cases, said he's won every Jewish case he's taken. He said he was likelier to encounter problems with clients from Muslim countries and has lost a number of those cases.

David Cohen

One reason David Cohen may have avoided such pitfalls is that he rose up through the Treasury, a relative latecomer to the intelligence game, but which has become one of the busiest intelligence hubs in government. The department Cohen headed there, the Office of Terrorism and Financial Intelligence, has existed only since 2004. His immediate predecessor, Stuart Levey, also was Jewish.

The CIA did not consent to an interview on Cohen.

Cohen is from Boston and in high school became friends with Jamin Dershowitz, the son of Harvard professor and well-known Israel advocate Alan Dershowitz. Cohen and the younger Dershowitz, who is general counsel to the WNBA, are still close. ■

Jerusalem mayor, bodyguard subdue Palestinian stabber

JTA, JERUSALEM

Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat and his security guard apprehended a Palestinian teen who stabbed a haredi Orthodox man near City Hall.

Barkat was on his way to City Hall for a meeting on Sunday evening when he saw the attack taking place near Safra Square in central Jerusalem.

The victim, reportedly in his 20s, was stabbed in the stomach and taken to a Jerusalem hospital for treatment. He is in moderate condition.

The alleged attacker, 18, a resident of Ramallah who was residing illegally in Jerusalem, was taken in for questioning by police. ■

Grave of Breslover founder's daughter vandalized in Ukraine

JTA

The grave of a daughter of the Breslover movement's founder, Rabbi Nachman, was set on fire and daubed with a swastika.

The 1831 grave in the central-Ukraine city of Kremenchuk was set ablaze some time after the completion last month of its renovation by the Oholei Tzadikim association, which works to restore Jewish burial sites throughout the region. It was discovered Feb. 16, the association said.

"The damage is very extensive," Rabbi Shimon Buskila of the World Breslov Center told JTA on Sunday. "They destroyed the structure that was only recently erected."

Pictures of the site showed the charred interior of a small structure constructed around the headstone. A swastika was drawn in black ink on the exterior of the structure, with a face and the words "Office Man Serega" in Latin.

According to Oholei Tzadikim, the area was designated to become a construction site, but the association cited its sanctity in preventing the project. Police have been informed and are working to prevent its recurrence, Rabbi Israel Meir Gabai, the association's director general, said. He added the group will repair the damages.

Rabbi Nachman's teachings have inspired thousands of followers. His grave in Uman, Ukraine, is among the chassidic world's most visited burial sites. ■

OPINION

Where is dangerous?

Sagi Melamed

I recently spent a week in Eilat with my son Ari. In addition to being a particularly enjoyable time, it fulfilled two promises: one we made to Ari to let him take a scuba diving course after he achieved high grades last year in high school, and a promise I made to myself to finish writing my new book by Passover. But most important of all – it was quality father-son time.

In January, Eilat is a great place for a vacation in Israel. A beautiful beach with clear waters, a feeling of relative isolation from the world and reasonable prices (prices soar in the summer and during holidays). For six days, we disengaged from everyday life. Ari learned to dive while I sat and wrote, and in the evenings we enjoyed ourselves together.

The hotel, on Eilat's south beach, was almost empty. In addition to us, there were a few couples from Europe and one Israeli couple. It was so empty that one morning they sent us to the neighbouring hotel for breakfast. (Ari would have preferred the Israeli breakfast to be served at lunchtime, because who can eat so much food in the morning before diving?)

As we sat at breakfast on Tuesday, the peace was suddenly shattered by a woman yelling, "Uri, shall I bring you an omelet? They've got omelets with all kinds of fillings."

I turned toward the shouting and saw a woman bringing several plates laden with food to the corner table where her husband sat. He looked from his boisterous wife toward me, a little embarrassed by her behaviour and yet a little annoyed at my intrusive gaze. I politely averted my eyes, but my ears could not escape the woman's loud voice.

She went to the omelet station, where a hotel employee was frying omelets.

"Where are you from?" she asked him in English. "From Africa," he replied in Hebrew. She insisted on continuing in English, so the conversation was conducted in basic Hebrew on his part and broken English on hers.

Her: "Isn't it dangerous in Africa? I heard that there's a lot of violence. Explosions and shooting."

Him: "Not really. If you have work, it's a beautiful place to live. It's a wonderful place for tourists."

> In just the last few weeks, there have been terrorist stabbings in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, attacks in the West Bank and on the Lebanese border, shooting from Syria, terror in the Sinai Peninsula and tension in the south

Her: "I wouldn't want to go there, it's too dangerous. I don't understand how anyone could live there without being scared."

Overhearing this, I recalled recent events in Israel and thought to myself: in just the last few weeks, there have been terrorist stabbings in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, attacks in the West Bank and on the Lebanese border, shooting from Syria, terror in the Sinai Peninsula and tension in the south. Several senior police officers accused of sexual harassment have resigned or been removed from office... A mere two years after the previous elections we are going back to the polls and will probably elect yet another government that will be unable to govern. And she thinks Africa is a dangerous place!

Then I remembered a conversation I had a number of years ago in Los Angeles, during a dinner with a pleasant Jewish couple. I invited them to visit Israel and the woman responded that she was afraid to come.

"Israel looks too dangerous, full of bombings and shooting."

I did not pressure her. But when we left the restaurant and the man pointed out a high school where the previous week a student had been killed in a shooting incident, I could not restrain myself and I said with a smile, "Are you sure it's Israel that's the dangerous place?!"

So where does that leave us? Perhaps with the conclusion that danger is relative. That the known is generally less scary than the unknown. That there's no place like home. And, of course – with the recognition that we have no other country. ■

Jerusalem co-op to provide transportation on Shabbat

No, not Shabbos – Shabus. That's the name of a new Jerusalem shared transportation co-operative, offering a way to get around the city on Shabbat and Jewish holidays, when there is no public transportation.

Laws prohibit public transportation on Shabbat in Jerusalem, but there's no prohibition on travelling with private transportation, said Laura Wharton, a Jerusalem Meretz party city council member, who is part of the co-operative.

Shabus, said Wharton, is a response to an existing social problem, not a challenge to the religious establishment.

"If you have a car, you can do whatever you want. But because of religious coercion and laws that exist, there's no public transportation. So if you can't afford a car or a taxi, you're trapped."

The co-operative, whose board members include Wharton and longtime Meretz council member Pepe Alalu, formed the Co-operative Transportation Association of Jerusalem to try to solve the Saturday transportation issue, said Wharton.

Shabus will offer an alternative, co-operative form of transportation, which will run on Fridays and Saturdays for members of the co-operative.

Egged, the country's public bus company, does not run most of its buses on Shabbat or Jewish holidays. Service ends on Friday afternoon and resumes Saturday evening, after Shabbat, although buses do run in certain areas such as Haifa, where there is a large non-Jewish population.

The subject of public buses in Israel on Shabbat tends to be a sensitive one. Last fall, when daylight saving time went into effect, Egged announced that some intercity bus routes would stop running at an earlier hour on Friday, in order to avoid conflicting with the earlier start of Shabbat on Friday evenings.

There was a flurry of Knesset debate and blogger discussion about the situation.

Israel's prohibition of public transportation on Shabbat is based on a 1947 understanding between then-prime minister David Ben-Gurion and the Agudat Yisrael movement, which represented the ultra-Orthodox community of that period. This became the basis of many religious life decisions in Israel, including the issue of public transportation on Shabbat.

"We can't offer Shabus to the general public," said Wharton. "That would break the law." Instead, the co-operative is offering a NIS 50 membership and has launched a 45-day crowdfunding effort on Headstart. The campaign aims to get people signed up and to raise NIS 100,000 ($32,270 Cdn) to cover the costs of advertising and make arrangements with a private transportation company.

The plan is to start operating Shabus by Passover – "the symbolic holiday of freedom," Wharton said, when people want to travel around the city. "It's... frustrating for Jerusalemites," she continued. "There are so many places that are open, restaurants and museums and the zoo, but you can't get to them if you don't have a car."

The co-operative has been working together for about a year, Wharton said. They formed a charter, and then hired a lawyer and an accountant, with the aim of making sure that Shabus could be feasible economically.

It's not the first time there have been efforts to create a transportation alternative for weekends in Jerusalem. In 2012, the Hebrew University's student union tried to operate a van service for students to get from campus to the city's downtown area on Friday nights.

Wharton said thousands of Jerusalemites could be part of the co-operative. Some 20 per cent of the city's population is secular and many don't have cars.

The Shabus board is just handling Jerusalem for now, Wharton said. But it could work anywhere in the country.

"As long as it's a co-operative and not a public company, it's groups of people co-ordinating together," Wharton said. "This is something I believe in for any field: if you have a problem and the government and authorities aren't helping solve it, organize. It's a real, positive model of grassroots organizations working for the benefit of their residents."

If government policy ever changed and allowed Egged to operate on Shabbat, the co-operative would "happily defer to Egged," she said. "We're not asking for public funding or to change the policy. We're just trying to help people move around on Saturdays, to get into town or visit friends or family. It's a special movement to overcome limitations that now exist." ■

More Israeli Arabs volunteer for National Service

LINDA GRADSTEIN
JERUSALEM

Majd Abu Diab crouches next to Jacqueline, an older Jewish woman in a wheelchair who has lost the power of speech. He sings a song in Arabic as he drums his fingers on her wheelchair. Her eyes light up and her head bobs along in tune. At the end of the song, they hug.

In the next room, another woman is thrilled to see Abu Diab, who everyone here at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem calls Glory, the English translation of Majd. He reminds her that she has physical therapy soon and says he'll come back to get her.

"Remember, you promised to blow dry my hair later," she says coquettishly.

Abu Diab is three months into a year-long stint as a volunteer in Israel's National Service, an alternative to compulsory military service. Most of those exercising this option are Orthodox Jewish women who aren't comfortable with men outside their family. But a growing number are Arabs, mostly citizens of Israel, but even some, like Diab, who are residents of Jerusalem, although he is a Jordanian citizen, are opting in.

"I come from a rich family where I got everything I wanted, and I never gave anything to anyone," he said. "I decided I wanted to give something back to this earth."

He tried to join the Israeli army but says that he was rejected because he was Arab. He spent a few months learning Hebrew, which he never learned in high school. Then he received this posting, where he works basically as an orderly. Like all National Service volunteers, he receives a small stipend of about $200 per month, which he supplements by working in a shoe store in the evenings.

"I lift the patients in and out of wheelchairs and I make sure they get to their appointments," he said. "Sometimes I bring supplies to the ward."

But mostly, he makes the patients happy. "One of the patients had a birthday and Glory brought in balloons and a card for her," staff member Tami Buzaglo said. "He is always smiling and he makes everyone laugh. We just love having him here."

While most Jewish citizens are conscripted (girls for two years, boys for three), Arab citizens of Israel are exempt,

> "I come from a rich family where I got everything I wanted, and I never gave anything to anyone. I decided I wanted to give something back to this earth."

although certain sectors including the Druze and the Bedouin volunteer for military service. About 50 Christian Arab citizens join the army each year, even though most Arab citizens oppose this, as they see the Israeli army as perpetuation of Israel's control over the West Bank and Gaza.

When it comes to national service, Arab opinion is divided, analysts say. In most cases, national service is done in local Arab communities, in schools and hospitals. It especially offers a chance for girls, who are sheltered in traditional Arab culture, to learn skills while still living at home.

"National service is an entry into Israeli society," Sammy Smooha, a professor of sociology at Haifa University said. "Especially for girls, it offers a good option for the time after high school. Boys can work or study, but Arabs still like their girls to stay close to home."

The numbers have been steadily increasing. In the past year, the number has jumped 30 per cent to more than 4,000 non-Jews serving. When they finish, they receive the same benefits that anyone who has served in the army receives, including a grant of several thousand dollars, and subsidized college tuition.

Smooha said Arab leaders have discouraged national service, because it is run by Israel's Defence Ministry. But more young Arabs are joining, seeing it as a way to achieve personal fulfilment and to get ahead in Israeli society.

Abu Diab said he hasn't experienced any anti-Arab feeling from either staff or patients, and feels he's helping them.

"We don't look if you are Arab, Christian, Muslim or Jewish," he said. "Everyone welcomed me." ■

Actress strikes it rich in Netflix series

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Up-and-comer Brooke Wexler, 21, is starring in Netflix's newest series, Richie Rich, which debuted Feb. 20. Richie Rich is the live-action TV adaption of the celebrated comic book character about the richest kid in the world, created in 1953.

Born and raised in Toronto, Wexler plays Irona, Richie Rich's robot maid. She spoke to The CJN from her current home in Malibu.

"Irona was portrayed very differently in the comics than she is by me. I think they wanted to create a younger companion – not on the same level as the kids. A modern portrayal of the comic book," Wexler explains.

Irona is not the robot people expect her to be.

"There is no silver! Irona doesn't like to clean, and has a little attitude, but she is still considered a friend, not just an employee," said Wexler.

Wexler comes to the role following another TV series, Sequestered, a courtroom drama produced by Sony Digital that aired on Apple and Crackle TV.

The two projects could not be more different from one another.

"I went from acting in a heavy drama in Sequestered to high comedy. It was very exciting to delve into different characters and genres as an actor," she said.

Richie Rich is brought to television by DreamWorks Animation's AwesomenessTV with a modernized version of the traditional story. The new edition follows Richie as he adjusts to life as the richest kid in the world. However, unlike the original version where Richie Rich was born into wealth, here he is self-made, creating his fortune by inventing and selling cool green technology.

> I have always known acting is what I wanted to do

Following his overnight triumph, he moves his father and sister into his newly-built mansion. He also shares his success with his two best friends, Darcy and Murray, embarking on a series of adventures such as exploring Antarctica, making a movie with his friends, and meeting celebrities.

"I think the characters are being emulated from the original content but it's more modern because technology has really taken off. The writers and executive producers worked hard in being creative and coming up with new ideas. Each episode is different from the next with new gags and story lines to keep it interesting and fun. To work with the Netflix team was an honour," she said.

Geared for kids eight to 14 years old, the 21-episode series is available in Canada, the United States and Latin America.

"It's like watching Disney, in that families will watch it together. The show will appeal to everyone. There are some jokes slipped in for adults, who will probably end up watching parts of it."

Wexler moved from Toronto to Los Angeles when she was 18, and is a third-year student at Pepperdine University, where she studies media production.

In Toronto, Wexler trained at the Toronto Academy of Acting. As a young student, she attended Bialik Hebrew Day School, and later the girls' school Branksome Hall.

She exhibited a flair for drama performing in shows such as Twisted, Hercules, Willy Wonka, and Dream Girls from 2005 through 2007. She also modeled swimwear on Sports Illustrated.

Once in California, she continued acting lessons and appeared on The Tonight Show with Jay Leno in a comedy skit. She was also in a video by boy band The Vamps, Somebody to You, featuring Demi Lovato.

"I love going to movies, I am an avid reader, and enjoy watching lots of TV shows – it gives you a sense of different people and different stories. When you get an audition there is so much more to pull from to be creatively inspired. I have always known acting is what I wanted to do," she said.

Wexler tells young actresses that perseverance is key. "There will be people and situations that will prove as obstacles due to the challenges of breaking into the industry, but the main person that will push you forward is yourself. Always believe in yourself and your dreams," she emphasized.

Asked what she would do with Richie Rich's millions, "I would definitely buy material things like a new car or a beautiful beach home but I would get more satisfaction from spending my money on the people I love and on charities I believe in.

"If I had millions, I would want to make some sort of positive impact on the world," she concluded. ■

Israeli academic discusses the history of mankind

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Israeli academic Yuval Noah Harari's Sapiens: A Brief History of Humankind presents us with a refreshing and original way of perceiving the history of our species, Homo sapiens, since its emergence in East Africa about 2.5 million years ago. Just the vast scope of the book alone makes it seem a clever novelty.

Humans once had various "siblings" such as Neanderthals, which we evidently wiped out almost everywhere we encountered them. But we also loved our enemies. DNA evidence shows that, back about 30,000 or 40,000 years ago, some sapiens and Neanderthals mated and reared families. That's just one of many skeletons in our closet that Harari rattles in this imaginative and thought-provoking book.

Homo sapiens underwent a critically important "cognitive revolution" about 70,000 years ago, which drastically improved our ability to use language, make art, create myths and indulge in abstract thinking. As a result, masses of ancient humans banded together in increasingly larger tribal units. Tribes of hunter-gatherers that had a shared belief in myths or gods could co-operate with each other in greater numbers, which became a competitive edge when rival groups battled for supremacy.

For countless millennia, human tribes wiped each other out on a regular basis. Also great despoilers of nature, we were equally adept at expunging mammoths and other great beasts that once roamed the earth.

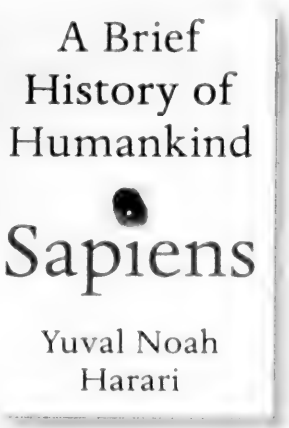
With an impressive array of scientific and historical knowledge in his quiver, Harari brings home ideas like an expert marksman. His comparisons of human cultures (i.e., Mayan vs. Roman) and epochs (Stone Age vs. Internet Age), seem especially enlightening and entertaining.

"The instinct to gorge on high-calorie food was hard-wired into our genes," he writes. "Today we may be living in highrise apartments with over-stuffed refrigerators, but our DNA still thinks we are in the Savannah. That's what makes us spoon down an entire tub of Ben & Jerry's when we find one in the freezer and wash it down with a jumbo Coke."

In the days of the hunter-gatherers, humans were spread out thinly over vast areas and a person might encounter no more than a few hundred others in a lifetime. Until the Agricultural Revolution of about 12,000 years ago, there were fewer people on Earth than the present population of Cairo.

Harari offers fascinating insight into the era when barley, rice, potatoes and other crops were first cultivated, a period that saw the rise of cities, city-states, and eventually political empires and universal religions. I was disappointed that he didn't discuss this transformative epoch in relation to the emergence of the Hebrew Bible and the Jewish people – certainly an important historical moment – but that clearly wasn't his interest. As for the Jews, he observes that they, along with the Armenians and Georgians, could justly claim descent from ancient Middle Eastern peoples, but notes they have picked up much baggage in their travels.

"It goes without saying that the political, economic and social practices of modern Jews, for example, owe far more to the empires under which they lived during the past two millennia than to the traditions of the ancient kingdom of Judaea," he writes. "If King David were to show up in an ultra-Orthodox synagogue in present-day Jerusalem, he would be utterly bewildered to find people dressed in east European clothes, speaking in a German dialect (Yiddish) and having endless arguments about the meaning of a Babylonian text (the Talmud). There were neither synagogues, volumes of Talmud, nor even Torah scrolls in ancient Judaea."



SAPIENS: A Brief History of Humankind
Yuval Noah Harari
(Signal, McClelland and Stewart)

The latter sections of Sapiens focuses on the history and significance of money and the rise of global religion and political empires. Depending on their political views, some readers may find a number of the author's assertions to be provocative. The Agricultural Revolution is "history's biggest fraud," he asserts, because it promised but failed to deliver a better quality of life for the world's peasant class. Instead, it enslaved us, tied us to the land, and put us in "artificial enclaves" called homes. He also questions whether the Scientific Revolution that began about 500 years ago has actually been beneficial to us.

A certain cynicism seems to ooze from the page at times, as when Harari contends that there's no such thing as human rights, that humans live their lives in perceptual prisons, and that Westerners have experienced 2,000 years of "monotheistic brainwashing." But sadly, few can quibble when he declares that humans are destroying the planet.

In contrast to his dystopian vision of modern Western society, he seems to regard the era of the hunter-gatherers as an idyllic utopia. Apparently everyone ate a nicely balanced diet back then and no one had to work too hard. No matter that a much higher proportion of humanity died in war or from disease.

During an interview in Toronto in mid-February, Harari told me that modern man has lost the ability to live richly and spontaneously. "Hunter-gatherers always lived in the present moment," he said. "They were extremely aware of their sensory world, of everything they heard and smelled and touched, because their survival depended on it. Today, especially in advanced societies, people don't need to pay attention in order to survive; therefore we are continually distracted and we have lost much of the ability to actually inhabit our bodies and our world, and to pay attention to what we hear, see, smell and touch."

A lecturer in history at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Israeli-born author was teaching a course on world history a few years back when he noticed that his students craved a Hebrew-language book on the topic. "I took my lecture notes and transformed them into a book," he said. "And when it became a huge bestseller in Israel, I translated it into English, and now it's been translated into almost 30 languages worldwide."

Sapiens: A Brief History of Humankind opens as a witty page-turner about the human family but its extended and uneven discussion of money robs it of some of its lustre. Even so, there is still a mother lode of gold here amidst the dross. ■

Toronto photographer reconnects with his Slovak roots

JORDAN ADLER

Yuri Dojc in his Toronto workshop with one of those stunning images. JORDAN ADLER PHOTO

Photographer Yuri Dojc was at his father's funeral in 1997 when he met a Slovakian woman who had survived Auschwitz. This woman led the now Toronto-based photographer to a small but vibrant community of Holocaust survivors from that nation, where only around 2,500 Jews live today.

Although he had also grown up in what was then Czechoslovakia after the Holocaust, Dojc was told by his father to deny his Jewish identity in public.

"I had a need to recover something which I lost," Dojc tells The CJN. "This [project] was a better education than anything else."

Dojc spent more than 15 years taking portraits of survivors, as well as the last vestiges of prewar Jewish life in Slovakia. The photographs now fill a book, Last Folio, and are a memorial to those who perished during the Holocaust and those who survived but can no longer tell their stories.

Some of his photographs are on display at the Art Gallery of Ontario until June 14, 2015, as an extension of the exhibit on Lodz Ghetto photojournalist Henryk Ross.

Dojc's urge to capture the last remnants of Jewish life was assisted by film producer Katya Krausova, who also had Slovakian roots. They traveled to their homeland with some seed money to make a documentary.

The two of them kept coming across incredible places and people, finding traces of Jewish life often by incredible luck.

In a small town in eastern Slovakia, Dojc was taking pictures of a couple when their neighbour knocked on the door. The man heard about the project and was begging to show them something.

The Christian man had a key to an old school for Jewish students before the war. Those who attended the Jewish school were deported to the camps in 1943. Ever since, much of the school remained untouched.

"The whole project changed suddenly," Dojc says. "We couldn't believe what we saw."

The discovery of the Jewish school had extra meaning for Dojc, since his mother and father were teachers. Ludovit and Regina Dojc had teacher friends who were Lutheran and hid them during the Holocaust.

Dojc admits that he had little interest in the story of their survival when he was growing up in Slovakia.

"I was brought up under Communist rule. When you're a teenager, the last thing you want to know is some heavy questions," he says.

From this discovery, much of the rest of the project came together as a result of chance encounters. Dojc and Krausova would enter a town, only to hear from random people about cemeteries, synagogues and other portions of Jewish history that had been hidden or ignored.

The photographer was stunned when he found a prayer room with piles of books. The books look tattered, crumbling into dust due to their age. Their covers were torn, but still thick like bark.

As the creative partners sorted through the books, Krausova asked Dojc about his family history and the names of his grandparents. It turns out that, amidst the several books in the room, was one that belonged to Jakub Deutch, his grandfather.

"There were so many serendipities," Dojc says. "Nothing was planned. We didn't [know where to find things]. Every picture was done by some unbelievable coincidence."

During his travels, he found a man on the cusp of renovating a vast, abandoned synagogue. The man gave Dojc the key and the photographer then made the most of his day, snapping away inside the empty, dilapidated holy site.

On another day, he was driving past a cemetery. When he stopped to look around the site, it turned out to be a Jewish burial ground.

"It was like somebody was guiding us," he says. "I'm not a religious person but this was too many coincidences."

The images from Last Folio have already been shown at museums around the world. On the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz-Birkenau in January, the exhibition was featured at the UN in New York.

During this anniversary year, the photographs will be displayed in Berlin and at Moscow's Museum of Tolerance.

Meanwhile, Krausova's documentary of the same name is finished and is scheduled to screen in Slovakia later this year. (There is no planned distribution in North America.)

Dojc has been a commercial photographer for much of his life, ever since moving to Toronto in the late 1960s. He helped with memorable advertising campaigns for companies like Porsche, Coca-Cola, Canon and Apple, and still works for various magazines.

However, he says he was not prepared for such a personal project to consume him. Working on Last Folio reconnected Dojc to his fragmented Jewish roots.

"I can read history, I can read the Bible if I want to," he says. "But nothing can teach you more than actually physically going through the places, walking up the steep hills with a bunch of Gypsy children, because they're going to show you a Jewish cemetery."■

Montreal rabbi raises parchment prayers to fine art

HEATHER SOLOMON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, MONTREAL

Rabbi Yair Mordechai Tanger often enters the Manoir Montefiore synagogue in Cote St. Luc with his suit speckled with bits of gold, silver and copper.

His congregants tell him, "Rabbi, you're glowing with sparks!" To say that the sparks are emanations of holy inspiration would be truthful.

This is because they originate from the whisper-thin foil he applies to the decorations on his calligraphic creations as a manifestation of hiddur mitzvah, enhancing the mitzvot through beauty.

"Instead of having only plain writing, you can add beauty to it and for the Eshet Hayil [Woman of Valour] prayer, for example, that is said by the husband on Shabbat, it becomes a reminder of the beauty of the relationship between husband and wife" he says.

Not only are the words of the prayer written in heart formation but the rabbi has added golden birds holding a personalized banner containing the wife's name and more birds perched on a branch at the bottom, "symbolizing a peaceful house". Flowers in blue and red foil garland the prayer.

"Most of the time I use real 22-karat gold and I found a kind of gold leaf that has a marbling effect for the flame of Shabbat candles. Everything is done by hand. Each piece is unique," says the rabbi who applies special glue within the outlines of his decorative motifs, rubs on the foil or gold leaf and brushes away the excess, sometimes building up the image to a raised and burnished gleam.

In his tiny office on the ground floor of the seniors' residence, just steps away from its on-site shul, Rabbi Tanger welcomes those who wish to speak with him whether it's for counselling, advice or to see what is currently under his quill.

Working in this seniors' residence, as he has done for the past four years, has special significance for the rabbi. The seniors inspire his work, which is a visual reinforcement of tradition.

His exquisite creations are made on parchment derived from cow hide, similar to that used for Torah scrolls. He has rolls of the parchment shipped from Israel, cuts them to size and floats the finished pieces between glass inside frames.

Rabbi Tanger has been a sofer (scribe) for a decade and continues to write and verify tfillin, mezuzot and sifrei Torah in the community. He arrived in Montreal from Los Angeles in 2003 having left Israel with his parents in 1999.

"I was born in Yamit in the northern Sinai that was given back in 1982 to the Egyptians as part of the Egypt-Israel peace treaty. I was the last baby to have a brit milah there before the town was evacuated," he says.

He is now working on a Magen David surrounding the prayer for soldiers said in most synagogues, using a new technique juxtaposing copper and silver leaf.

The rabbi began using gold leaf three years ago and now commissions take up the free time outside his rabbinic and sofrut duties. His work is not only popular in households but as gifts from clients to their clergy members and to other professionals for their offices.

"I have illustrated the blessing for success in business with the Key to Parnassa, the symbol of a good livelihood," he says. The household prayer follows the shape of a roofline, and a harp decorates the Nishmat kol chai prayer. Other examples will soon be found on a website he is building, www.sofer.info.

Rabbi Tanger upholds good causes with his artwork, especially the auctions of the Académie Yeshiva Yavne in support of scholarships and the Caisse Beth Yossef that comes to the aid of needy Jews.

Those who observe his works are immediately touched by their prayerful and visual beauty. "You have to be inspired in order to inspire someone else," says the rabbi. ■

Prayer explores Hebrew language through art

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Israeli-born, Vienna-based artist Dvora Barzilai is one of many talents who are showcasing their work in Toronto this winter through the second annual Spotlight on Israeli Culture.

The two-month showcase that is running until March, features the best of Israeli music, theatre, film, dance and visual arts, and brings together a number of local organizations, including Israel's Office of Cultural Affairs of the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto, the Aga Khan Museum, Ashkenaz Foundation, and Austrian Cultural Forum.

Barzilai, a mixed-media artist who made her work available for the event in Toronto despite not making the trip to the city herself, said having her art on display in another city without her reminds her of the famous poem by Yehuda Halevi, a medieval Spanish-Jewish poet.

"He says, 'my heart is in the east, and my body in the west', so I can say the same because I am in Vienna and my art is in Canada. I hope people like it," she said in an interview with The CJN from her Austrian home.

"This week I got a very nice letter from the Israeli consul and he wrote that he enjoyed it... so I'm happy."

The exhibit, called Prayer, which explores the Hebrew language in prayers, liturgy, songs, contemporary Hebrew proverbs and forgotten texts, and utilizes materials including gold leaf, tempera, sand, cement, ashes, oils and canvas, has been on display this month at the Miles Nadal JCC.

Barzilai said she's been working as an artist "since I've known myself."

She explained that there are a number of artists in her family and her father worked in Tel Aviv's art scene when she was a child.

"My father was working in the port of Tel Aviv [Namal], so as a child I would go and see the painters, and that for me was very inspiring... When I was a child I used to come with my father to walk on the port...

A piece from Dvora Barzilai's art exhibit called Prayer.

> I got a very nice letter from the Israeli consul and he wrote that he enjoyed it... so I'm happy if someone brought an exhibition to Tel Aviv, I would go with him to see that everything was alright, and it was also a part of my inspiration... Until today, I go there to sit and think about the art," she said.

Barzilai said that she trained with a number of Israeli artists while she grew up in Tel Aviv, before she moved to Vienna in 1992 with her husband and children.

"The reason we moved to Vienna was for my husband because he learned cantorial music in Tel Aviv and he got a job at the main synagogue in Vienna, so we moved the whole family," she explained.

"I started painting there, but we lived in a very small apartment and there was no room, so I took a pencil and I opened the Bible and started to sketch things about the Bible."

That paved the way for much of her artwork, which falls under the theme of religion and Jewish tradition.

Although she draws much of her inspiration from living as an observant Jew in Vienna, not all of it is based in religion.

For example, one of the pieces in her Prayer exhibit features the lyrics for Israel's national anthem, Hatikvah.

"Sometimes it is modern, sometimes it is songs or text that I like. I can't say it is only religious," she said.

Barzilai's work and outdoor installations have been displayed internationally, in places including Moscow, Romania, Bulgaria, and Austria. ■

AUTHORS & POETS

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

THE CANADIAN JEWISH NEWS CJN

We invite readers to submit unpublished, original short stories or poetry that explore Jewish themes.

They should not exceed 2,000 words. Selected submissions will appear in the Passover Supplement of The CJN on April 2, 2015. Not all submissions can be published, and not all those selected will appear in both Toronto and Montreal editions. We look for originality. Please don't send more than three entries. We cannot correspond with submitters.

Deadline for submissions is Feb. 27, 2015 at 3 p.m.

E-mail submissions to:

cjnliterarysupplement@gmail.com

We can only accept email submissions. We prefer Word documents.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Purim: the fun holiday

JUDY BART KANCIGOR
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

"Eat, drink and be merry." Hardly a directive one would expect from the pulpit. But this is Purim, and revelry and festivities are the order of the day.

Comic elements exist in the Megillah: a king's wife spurned, a beauty contest to choose a new wife, an evil prime minister, the near annihilation of our people, a palace plot thwarted and our enemies defeated through the machinations of said new wife.

Surely God had a hand in the outcome, yet there is no mention of God in the Megillah, a source of debate for centuries.

Purim is a holiday of masks, and the miracle of our redemption unfolds through a series of natural events and "coincidences," but were they really? Just like the filling in the hamantashen, the role of God in the Purim story is hidden," writes Paula Shoyer, a graduate of the Ritz Escoffier pastry program in Paris, and author of The Holiday Kosher Baker (Sterling).

"And just as with the hamantashen, the true significance of the holiday unfolds. We should always look for the hidden and deeper meaning of our experiences in life as a way to acknowledge the unseen forces in the world."

In her cookbook, Shoyer presents traditional desserts with a distinctively modern twist with clear, detailed directions and lavish colour photos.

Along with new versions of sponge cakes, blintzes, challahs and rugelach, you'll find a chic Raspberry and Rose Macaron Cake, a Salted Caramel Banana Tart Tatin and recipes for low-sugar, gluten free, vegan and nut-free treats.

"Interestingly, the Megillah is the first place in the Bible where the word 'Jew' appears," Shoyer notes. And leave it to the Jews to commemorate this near tragedy with humour. "Purim is the most whimsical holiday of the Jewish calendar," she says. "We put on Purim spiels, comedic plays that enact the Purim story, and dress in costumes."

And of course we eat hamantashen, those three-cornered cookies filled with jam, poppy seeds, prunes or even chocolate, that are supposed to resemble Haman's hat. Whether Haman ever wore a hat, three-cornered or not, is in question by some, as is the whole story altogether.

"The filling is mostly hidden," Shoyer writes, "and only when we break open the cookie do we experience the flavour inside." The book includes recipes for eight varieties, including Raspberry, Vanilla Bean, Low-Sugar, Green Tea and Gluten-Free.

We celebrate Purim with the mitzvah of mishloach manot (literally "sending portions" in Hebrew), giving sweets to family and friends.

"The giving of gifts celebrates our survival, an acknowledgement that we are still here," says Shoyer. Her recipes in this chapter reflect the fun and whimsy of the holiday: Decorated Brownie Bites, Licorice or Root Beer Chocolate Truffles, Mazel Cookies (her take on Fortune Cookies), Homemade Marshmallows: Coconut or Raspberry Swirl, and Tie-Dyed Mini Black and White Cookies, "my whimsical Purim version of classic chocolate and vanilla black and white cookies," she says.

If Purim is here, can Passover be far behind? Heads up: The Holiday Kosher Baker contains 45 Passover recipes, including Lemon Tart with Basil Nut Crust, Chocolate Chocolate Éclairs and Lime Macarons.

Chocolate Chip Hamantashen

Dough

- ❑ 3 large eggs
- ❑ 1 cup sugar
- ❑ 1/2 cup canola or vegetable oil
- ❑ 1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
- ❑ 3 cups all-purpose flour, plus extra for dusting
- ❑ dash salt
- ❑ 3 oz. semisweet or bittersweet chocolate, chopped into small pieces no larger than 1/4-inch (very important)

Filling

- ❑ 6 1/2 oz. semisweet or bittersweet chocolate, cut into 1/2-in. squares or
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups chocolate chips

In large bowl, mix together eggs, sugar, oil and vanilla. Add flour and salt and mix until dough comes together. Add chopped chocolate and mix in gently. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate one hour to firm up.

Preheat oven to 350. Line 2 or 3 large cookie sheets with parchment. Divide dough in half.

Sprinkle flour on another piece of parchment, place 1 dough half on top; then sprinkle a little more flour on top of dough. Place second piece of parchment on top of dough and roll on top of parchment until dough is about 1/4-in. thick. Every few rolls, peel top parchment and sprinkle a little more flour on both sides.

Use a 2- to 3-in. cookie cutter or glass to cut dough into circles. With metal flat-blade spatula, lift circles and place on another part of flour-sprinkled parchment. Place one 1/2-in. square of chocolate or 7 chocolate chips into centre and fold three sides together very tightly. Place on prepared cookie sheets. Repeat with remaining dough.

Bake 14-16 minutes or until bottoms are lightly browned but tops are still light. Slide parchment onto wire racks to cool. Store in airtight container up to 5 days or freeze up to 3 months. ■
